CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FORTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

remonstrating against the passage of the bill (H. R. 3617) changing the time or limit of United States patents from seventeen to five years; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. PLUMB. I have some petitions addressed to me, but their subject-matter is of such a character that I can not conceive that they were intended for my consideration alone, and I ask that I may be permitted to present them to the Senate. They are in regard to the subject of education in Alaska. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to present them, and that they be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent to present certain papers on the subject of education in Alaska. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and they will be received and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. PLUMB. I present a petition signed by a number of ex-officers of the Union Army, setting forth certain unfair differences which they claim now exist between the pay which they as pensioners of the United States receive and the pay received by officers of similar rank on the retired-list of the Army. I have been asked in the letter which accompanies the petition that I should read it to the Senate. I prefer, if there be no objection, that the Secretary should read the petition at the desk. It is from a class of people who are entitled to consideration, and the subject they mention is one of interest.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the subject of the petition?

Mr. PLUMB. The difference between the pensions of late officers of the Army and the pay of officers on the retired-list.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the petition which he has presented, the nature of which he has stated, be read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be read.

The petition was read by the Chief Clerk, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The petition of the undersigned, late commissioned officers of volunteers, and now on the pension-rolls for wounds and disabilities received in the military service of the United States, respectfully represents that there are now pending in Congress two bills (S. 1306 and H. R. 3485) which propose to fix the rate of pension hereafter to be granted to all commissioned officers at one-half of the pay of the rank held by such officers at the time the disability was received on account of which he was pensioned. We ask your careful consideration and favorable action on said bills, and present what we believe are just and valid reasons why such legislation should be had.

The great and unfair difference now existing between the pay of officers of the Army on the retired-list and the pensions granted to commissioned officers of volunteers is shown by the following table:

Pay of commissioned officers on the retired-list of the Army.

	Per month.
A major-general	$468 75
A brigadier-general	343 75
A colonel	281 25
A lieutenant-colonel	250 00
A major	218 75
A captain	175 00
A first lieutenant	140 00
A second lieutenant	131 25

N. B.—In addition to the above pay, officers on the retired-list are allowed to purchase from the commissary and quartermaster's departments all supplies and fuel, &c., required for the use of themselves and their families at rates from 10 to 33 per cent. less than the same can be purchased in open market by private citizens.

Rate of pensions to commissioned officers of volunteers.

	Per month.
For a lieutenant-colonel and all of higher rank	$30 00
For a major	25 00
For a captain	20 00
For a first lieutenant	17 00
For a second lieutenant	15 00

N. B.—These rates are for total disability.

On January 1, 1883, there were 415 officers on the retired-list of the Army. Of this number 117 were graduates of the Military Academy; the other 298 came from the Army and from the volunteer service, and were in no respect, as your petitioners believe, more worthy of consideration than themselves. We had been wounded in the same battles, disabled in the same campaigns; only our comrades now on the retired-list had the good fortune, or the "influence," at the close of the civil war to be appointed in the regular Army and subsequently retired, while we, your petitioners, after frequent examinations by boards of surgeons and our disabilities graded, are now on the pension-rolls, receiving a rate of pension out of all proportion to the pay enjoyed by retired officers, and which as a means of livelihood is entirely inadequate.

The rate of pension granted to an enlisted man is, for total disability (not specific), $8 per month, being one-half of his full pay while in active service.

The rate of pay for officers on the retired-list is three-quarters of the full pay of their rank, and the disabilities of officers on the retired-list are not graded, as on the pension-rolls, but all receive alike the full three-quarters pay of their rank, without regard to the degree of disability.

Your petitioners are unable to see any reason for the continuance of this most unjust discrimination, and we pray that it may be corrected by the passage of the bills above referred to. And your petitioners will ever pray.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to say in regard to the subject of the petition that while I think the comparison which the petitioners draw between the amounts which they receive and the amounts received by officers of similar rank on the retired-list is entitled to great consideration, at the same time they unfortunately make a comparison between themselves and those who receive pensions as private soldiers which I think is to their great disadvantage. If it were only a question between the officers of the regular Army on the retired-list and the officers of the late Union Army on the pension-list, I would very cheerfully vote to equalize it by putting up the pensions of officers on the pension-list; but it is far more than that. It is a question as to whether the two or three hundred thousand soldiers who are now on the pension-list are getting justice, and their complaint, in my judgment, against the officers by whom they were lately commanded on account of the disparity of their pension as against that received by the officers is fully as well founded as the complaint which these officers make against the officers on the retired-list. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAHONE presented a petition of citizens of Spottsylvania County, Virginia, praying for the distribution of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Norfolk, Va., praying for relief in the matter of rebate in taxes as provided in the act of March 3, 1883, to reduce internal revenue, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Salem, N. C., praying for the passage of a bill providing for the payment of the French spoliation claims; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

It is not necessary to read the list, I suppose; it can be entered on the Journal.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think it had better be read, so as to go into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Secretary will read the report.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SALARIES OF DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 1409) to fix the salary of the judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Nevada, to report it adversely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator wish to have the bill indefinitely postponed?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I ask that it be put on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator will not desire to have it put on the Calendar when he hears the reports I am authorized to make.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. I have a number of bills for this purpose, all of which I propose to recommend the indefinite postponement of, and then to report a general bill which covers the most of the cases. I think it does not cover Nevada, but that may come in as an amendment to the bill if the Senator wishes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the bill will be indefinitely postponed. It is so ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 246) to fix the salary of the judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Oregon, to report it adversely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be postponed indefinitely, if there be no objection.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. That case is included in the general bill.

Mr. DOLPH. I was going to ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar, but as the Senator who reported it now states that Oregon is provided for in a general bill I do not wish to make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be indefinitely postponed. It is so ordered.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1253) to fix the salaries and prescribe certain duties of the district judges of the United States, reported it adversely, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the petition of E. W. Kimball, John McClure, A. M. Rose, and other gentlemen, composing the entire bar of Little Rock, in the State of Arkansas, asking for an increase of the salary of the judge of the United States court in the eastern district of Arkansas, and who had before them sundry other papers relating to the general subject, to report an original bill.

The bill (S. 1476) fixing the salaries of district judges of the United States was read twice by its title.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the bill, which is very brief, be printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that order will be made.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the salaries of the following district judges, to wit, the judge of the northern and southern districts of Mississippi, the judges of the eastern district of Arkansas, the northern and southern districts of Illinois, the district of Kentucky, the eastern district of Louisiana, the district of Maryland, the district of Massachusetts, the eastern district of Michigan, the eastern and western districts of Missouri, the district of New Jersey, the northern, southern, and eastern districts of New York, the southern district of Ohio, the district of Oregon, the eastern and western districts of Pennsylvania, the western district of Tenpessee, and the western district of Texas, shall be, from and after the 1st day of July, 1884, at the rate of $5,000 per year.

SEC. 2. That the salaries of the following district judges, to wit, the judges of the district of Minnesota, the district of Kansas, and the western district of Arkansas, shall be, from and after the 1st day of July, 1884, at the rate of $4,000 per year.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make a statement in regard to the bill at this time.

The Judiciary Committee at the last session of Congress directed to the several district judges throughout the United States certain very searching inquiries calculated to elicit the amount of business done by those judges, the number of days they were employed in doing it, and the amount of business done by them in other districts than their own. No district judge of the United States has a salary of over $4,000 with the exception of the district judge in the State of California, whose salary is $5,500. In several of the districts the judges are having an amount of work more than enough to demand the entire time throughout the whole year of the incumbent of the office, and, as the Senate is very well aware, the duties of these courts are of public importance. For instance, the judges of the district courts in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and pehaps San Francisco, if there were a great naval war, would represent the jurisprudence of the United States in the exposition of the law of nations as applied to prize and other maritime questions, holding the same relation to our jurisprudence that Lord Stowell did to that of England, having to expound a system which is much broader in its extent than the common law, extending over the entire civilized world, and to expound the law to which nations in their sovereign capacity are compelled to bow in submission. That judges of that kind, having also important patent jurisdiction, bankruptcy jurisdiction, ordinary admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, should be compensated by these petty salaries (I had almost said less than the average fees charged by the counsel who practice before them in single cases; it would be an exaggeration, but not a very great exaggeration, to say that) seems to me utterly wrong.

This bill has been framed on the principle of raising the salaries of the judges whose whole time is employed, so that it is substantially a hard year's work for the judge, to $5,000 instead of $4,000. Then there are a few judges who now have but $3,500 a year who are employed nearly the whole year (I think there are three or four of them), and their salary is fixed at $4,000. Others, in Florida or Delaware, who are occupied only five or six weeks in the course of the year, are left untouched, with however the judgment that if any one of the pending measures for the relief of the Supreme Court of the United States is adopted there is every probability that whatever measure will be adopted will impose new and large duties upon all the district judges, that they will be obliged to go out of their own district, and the salaries of those judges can then be revised.

I will say to the honorable Senator from Oregon that the salary of the district judge of Oregon is proposed to be raised by the bill to the highest standard, $5,000. In the case of Nevada there was no information before the committee. I can not at this moment say whether the judge answered the inquiries, or whether, if he did, his answer indicated that he was employed a small portion of the year. The committee recommend the increase of the salary of the judge in Oregon on the principle I have stated, and it is quite likely that there may be one or two judges, including perhaps Nevada, concerning whom some members of the Senate will be able to satisfy the committee that they will come within this principle. If so we shall cheerfully consent to such an amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish the Senator would add to his statement some information concerning the provisions of existing law for the expenses of these judges. Some of them travel long distances, and my impression is that their salary is materially reduced by such expenses.

Mr. HOAR. There is a provision of existing law that the expenses of district judges when called into other districts shall be paid by the United States, and some of the judges get a substantial addition to their salaries in that way; for instance, the judge in Vermont, I believe, is summoned to New York.

Mr. HAWLEY. My impression is that while they are called into adjoining districts for duty sometimes, the compensation allowed does not more than merely cover the additional expense, and in that case the labor is greatest.

Mr. HOAR. I presume not; but it covers the hotel bills, and to that extent includes the support of the judge during the time; but there is no provision of existing law for the traveling expenses of judges within their districts where they have to travel over large distances.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me, I should like to inquire what the result of the bill is in reference to the district judge in Indiana.

Mr. HOAR. The district judge in Indiana would be included in an amendment if not named in the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. At what rate is he provided for?

Mr. HOAR. At $5,000, the highest rate, I think.

Mr. HARRISON. In our State the district judge has to hold court at four places in the State twice annually, and he is put to a very large outlay in the way of traveling expenses, and there is no present provision of law by which he can be reimbursed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill, having been read the second time, will be placed on the Calendar.

DISTRICT HEALTH OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. GORMAN. By direction of the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 24) authorizing the printing of 2,500 copies of the report of the health officer of the District of Columbia, I report it without amendment. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It provides for printing 2,500 extra copies of the annual report of the health officer of the District of Columbia; 100 for the use of the Senate, 350 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,050 for the use of the health officer.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know why it is that the Senate is to receive so few copies. It will only give one copy apiece.

Mr. GORMAN. This is the usual number provided for the report of the health officer of the District of Columbia, for which there is a great demand on that officer throughout the country.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATISTICAL ABSTRACT.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred a resolution for printing additional copies of Executive Document No. 32, to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of the Statistical Abstract of the United States, being Executive Document No. 32, first session Forty-eighth Congress, of the House of Representatives, be printed for the use of the Senate.

REPORT OF LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred a resolution to print additional copies of the report of the Librarian of Congress, instruct me to report it without amendment and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the annual report of the Librarian of Congress for the calendar year 1883 be printed, and that 500 additional copies be printed, with covers, for distribution by the Librarian.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRISON. I introduce a bill on the subject of the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission over the margins of the river, and containing provisions enabling them to subject to Government use private lands and materials. This bill was introduced at the last Congress and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, but no action was taken upon it. I am informed that in not a few instances on the river the commission have met with obstructions in the shape of some obstinate land-owners who refused to concede what was necessary for the progress of the work. I therefore introduce this bill again, and ask the attention of the Committee on the Judiciary to it.

The bill (S. 1478) defining the powers and jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission, authorizing the appropriation of land and material for the improvement of the Mississippi River and its navigable tributaries, prescribing the manner of assessing damages for property so appropriated, and providing penalties for acts in hinderance or injury of such improvements, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1479) to authorize a preliminary examination and survey of the passes between the affluents of the Upper Missouri and Columbia Rivers for the purpose of ascertaining the distances between the navigable waters of said rivers and the practicability of uniting said rivers by canal or otherwise; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 1484) to provide for the study of physiology and the effect of intoxicating, narcotic, and poisonous substances upon life, health, and welfare by the pupils in the public schools of the Territories and the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 1485) to amend the laws relating to land titles in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1486) for the relief John R. Bond; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 1487) for the relief of the heirs and distributees of the estate of Silvia Wilford, of Duval County, Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1489) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on reservoirs, mains, and laterals for irrigation, and other purposes, in the arid-land region of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 1491) to authorize foot and carriage or railroad bridges across the Mississippi River at Saint Paul, in the State of Minnesota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN. I beg leave to state in this connection that this bill is transmitted to me by the mayor of the city of Saint Paul, and has the approbation of the councils of that city.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1492) to provide relief for policemen and firemen who may be disabled in service in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLUMB (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1493) to secure additional land to the Pottawatomie Indians; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MAHONE introduced a bill (S. 1494) for the relief of Frederick Foote, of Fairfax County, Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MILLER, of California, asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. 1495) to provide for the proper rewarding of Chief Engineer George W. Melville, United States Navy, for meritorious services, &c.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 60) donating condemned cannon to the town of Cavendish, Vt.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. MILLER, of California, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 697) to promote the efficiency of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MAHONE, it was Ordered, That the papers in the claim of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company be taken from the files and, with Senate bill No. 1478, Forty-seventh Congress, first session, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MAHONE. I submit the following order:

Ordered, That the papers in the claim of Frederick Foote on file in the Senate or in the Committee on Claims be referred to the Court of Claims for report to the Committee on Claims, as provided in the act of March 3, 1883.

Mr. COCKRELL. Ought not that to go to the Court of Claims? I move that the order be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MAHONE. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved by the Senator from Missouri that the order just presented be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CAMDEN, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of the trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Seminary and High School in Virginia be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims, to accompany Senate bill No. 706.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of the legal representatives of Daniel Bedinger, deceased, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to accompany Senate bill No. 497.

On motion of Mr. PALMER, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the case of Richard Hawley & Sons be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

GOVERNMENT TEA-FARM.

Mr. BUTLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into and report to the Senate, by bill or otherwise, the condition of the Government tea-farm near Summerville, S. C.; to inquire if said tea-farm has been abandoned by the Department of Agriculture; and, if so, why and by what authority, and whether the experiment of tea culture has been fairly and fully made.

Mr. BUTLER. In this connection I present a letter from John C. Minott and Henry A. Middleton, with accompanying papers, which I ask shall be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to accompany the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be referred to the committee with the resolution.

EXTRADITION OF TRIMBLE.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I desire to offer a resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call attention to the fact that the Chair omitted to notice that the morning hour expired some fifteen minutes since. Is it the pleasure of the Senate to continue the morning business? The Chair hearing no objection, the morning business will proceed.

Mr. MILLER, of California, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to inform the Senate what action, if any, has been taken by the executive department of the Government in relation to the demand of Mexico for the extradition for crimes committed in that country of one Trimble, said to be a citizen of the United States.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

Mr. FRYE. I offer the following:

Ordered, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to the Senate in brief any information in his possession touching the French spoliation claims; the names of claimants of vessels destroyed; whether or not there is evidence touching said claims filed in his Department, and in what cases there is evidence so filed, together with such other matter relating to this subject as he may think proper.

The Secretary of State, I am informed, is overwhelmed by letters of inquiry addressed to him by members of Congress touching this matter, and a great many members of Congress are overwhelmed by letters from their constituents. I understand that the information which I desire is ready to be communicated to the Senate.

The order was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

Mr. VAN WYCK submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be directed to ascertain whether any of the owners or officers of the Baltimore and Ohio Telegraph Company made or received proposals or entered into an agreement to consolidate with the Western Union Telegraph Company within the past twelve months, with power to send for persons and papers.

SUFFERERS BY THE OHIO FRESHET.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I ask the consent of the Senate to have read a telegram which I desire to have referred to the Committee on Appropriations—a telegram in the nature of a petition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent to have a telegram read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, February 11, 1884.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN:

Congress should authorize President to spend half million dollars to relieve sufferers in towns between Pittsburgh and Cairo, and action should be prompt. Cincinnati needs nothing, but other places are almost helpless. At 9 this morning Ohio at Gallipolis 8 feet higher than last year, and rising half inch an hour. At Cincinnati it is within 2 inches of highest water last year, and rose three-quarters of an inch last hour. It is raining throughout the valley and everything looks badly for people of towns who are already flooded.

RICHARD SMITH.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the telegram be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, not with a view to immediate action because I think it will be more proper to await the action of the House of Representatives in respect of the calamnity that has befallen the Ohio Valley, but that the Committee on Appropriations may have the matter under consideration and be prepared to act promptly whenever the House shall send them a resolution. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. I was going to present some dispatches myself, corroborating that which has been sent to the Senator from Ohio. I do not know, however, that it is necessary to do so. The dispatch sent up by the Senator from Ohio does not exaggerate the condition of the river towns from Cincinnati to Cairo. I have several dispatches and so has my colleague, but we shall not trouble the Senate with them, as action is sought to be taken on this one and we shall seek to be heard elsewhere in regard to such wants as our people may have.

Mr. CAMDEN. I desire to say that I have also dispatches from the governor of West Virginia and the mayors of several towns on the river which I may desire to present at the proper time. They are now before the Committee of Appropriations of the House, where we expect action to be had to-day.

REMOVALS OF CONGRESSIONAL EMPLOYÉS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER] on the 8th instant and laid over.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee of three on the part of the Senate and five on the part of the House of Representatives be appointed to inquire into and report the cause of all removals of subordinate officers made by the Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, the Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper, and Postmaster of the House of Representatives.

The committee is directed to reduce to writing the evidence which it takes in regard to all removals, and lay the evidence, together with its report, before the Congress.

The committee is further directed to report how many disabled and other soldiers were removed, what States and Congressional districts they were from, how many disabled and other soldiers have been appointed, and the States and Congressional districts from which they come.

The committee is further instructed to report whether in their opinion the act known as the civil-service act applies to appointments made by elective officers of the Senate and House of Representatives, and, if so, to report what legislation, if any, is necessary to the full and proper execution of that law.

Mr. BECK. I objected to that resolution the other day simply for the reason that I do not think the Senate has anything to do with action of the House of Representatives in any form. I do not object to inquiry into our own management, but I shall vote against any suggestion to the House of what action they should take in their own affairs. Whether they do right or wrong I care not, so far as this point is concerned.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I had not the pleasure the other day of listening to the remarks of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER], but I see by reading them in the RECORD that he challenges certain assertions in regard to the use of Federal patronage in the elections recently held in the State of Virginia. Now, sir, without entering into a discussion in regard to the propriety of the Senate investigating the disposition of the patronage of the House of Representatives, as the Senator has stated that the State of Virginia has not received its proportion of Federal patronage—that I believe was the language or substance of the remarks of that Senator—I propose to offer an amendment to his resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri submits an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the resolution:

And that said committee also be instructed to inquire and report what directions or instructions have been issued or given by the President or heads of Departments within the past three years in regard to appointments or removals of persons from the State of Virginia to or from places in the Federal service, and what appointments and removals have been so made and upon whose application or recommendation, together with the political opinions of the persons so appointed or removed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I do not know that I have any objection to the amendment if the Senator from Missouri wants to investigate matters of that sort in Virginia. I can give him no assurance in addition to the one he has read in the RECORD, that I do not know a single appointment that has been made on the western side of the State of Virginia by the Executive of this Government even with my knowledge before it was made, much less upon my application, before or during any political campaign. If the Senator had read the remarks I made understandingly, he would have seen that he makes a very grave mistake. I said that Virginia did not have her proportion under the civil-service rules of the offices in the Departments at Washington, and I repeat it, and I challenge investigation of that. I know very well that that State is charged with a full proportion, but as I said on Friday I say again to-day, that I can show that more than half of the Department officials charged to the State of Virginia come from other States and are recommended, as the books show, by Senators and Representatives from other States.

Now, sir, the civil-service rules do say in terms, and the civil-service law enacts in plain and unmistakable language, that the appointments to positions in the Departments shall be apportioned among the several States according to population. I did not come here to struggle for this patronage, but I mean at all times to answer back the allegation that Virginia has misused patronage and has got more than her proportion of the patronage of this Government. I offered the resolution, not because I wanted an investigation specially, though I have had sufficient provocation for two or three weeks to have done what the Senator from Kentucky did when he offered his resolution concerning the removal of Mr. Dudley. At one end of this Capitol there was a little crippled boy who had been trained and educated in one particular line of business there, who is so crippled as that he can not make a living at any other employment except that which can be given in such a department as he was laboring in. He comes from near my home. He was put upon the rolls by special resolution of the House, and he has been there for years; the resolution providing for him by name and fixing his per diem and saying that it should be paid out of the contingent fund of the House. And yet, sir, he was turned out, and an old gentleman who is unable absolutely to step up a ladder to reach the papers for members of Congress is put in his stead. I did not propose to investigate that; but the Senator from Kentucky did propose to investigate the removal of a colored man here. I thought if we were going into investigations of this sort, we might go into them on both sides of the Capitol.

I have the evidence that the civil-service act has been violated if it applies to the appointments under the elective officers of Congress, for I can show removals by the score; I believe I stated in the remarks I made on Friday that ten wounded soldiers had been discharged from one end of this Capitol. I can show, moreover, by this investigation, if it shall go on, that the emphatic reason given to men when their discharges were handed to them was that they had voted contrary to the views of the man who turned them out of office. If the civil-service act applies to appointments under the Postmaster, Doorkeeper, Sergeant-at-Arms, and Clerk of the House, then the civil-service act has been violated, and I hold that the authority which makes laws should be the last to violate them.

I claim that my resolution was a fit and proper one. I can not understand why gentlemen who claim to be sincerely in favor of civil-service reform should hesitate to vote for that resolution. It provides and suggests as the first consideration for the committee to consider whether these rules do apply, whether this act does apply to the two Houses of Congress in their appointments to office. If it does, then Congress ought not to set the example of violating its own statute about which so much has been recently said. It is a fit and proper resolution.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if any service can be done anybody, if any good can come out of an investigation of the matter he proposes in Virginia? I ask whether he has offered that amendment in that temper which ought to characterize a Senator here? I ask him whether when he offered it he felt that he was going to accomplish any great good for the people of Missouri? What good does he expect to accomplish by it for anybody, or does he want to cast by innuendo some reflection upon those who have been charged with misusing official patronage in Virginia? Sir, it would better become him to get up here and state the facts which he seems to think have occurred in that State and meet the issue on this floor, and I will promise him a Roland for his Oliver every time. I do deny that there has been a misuse or any abuse of the Federal patronage in Virginia, and I do deny that the State of Virginia has even received her proportion of the patronage that is due her under this Government in the various Departments in this city.

Federal patronage! We have one hundred and sixty-seven internal-revenue officers in that State, and pay nearly as much internal revenue as the largest States in the Union, as much as any of those which supply the alcoholic drinks of this country. They have in the State of Kentucky six hundred and sixty-seven internal-revenue officers, where they collect very little more revenue than the one hundred and sixty-seven collect in the tobacco-growing regions of Virginia. Federal patronage! Why, sir, we only want what belongs to us. We want nothing more, nothing less. I think the resolution offered by me will commend itself to every Senator who is sincerely in favor of civil-service reform. If the Senator wants to investigate the bestowal of Federal patronage in the State of Virginia, I have no objection to it; I will agree to gratify the Senator from Missouri to that extent, for I suppose from what appears to be the extreme irrelevancy of his amendment that he does want some gratification that can only be gotten in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. VEST. Without attempting to go into any further discussion of the matters stated in the resolution and that stated in the amendment, I suggest to the Senator from Virginia that I do not need any advice he may tender or volunteer to me. I shall endeavor to discharge my duties on this floor in my own fashion and according to my own judgment. I beg to remind the Senator from Virginia that he himself has brought the matter in regard to patronage in his State before the Senate. It originated with him. I find in the RECORD that he used these words:

> I am prepared to answer back all this ad captandum stuff that I have heard throughout the country about the patronage of the Federal Government being given out to certain gentlemen in the State of Virginia.

When a gentleman from that State, making that statement, offers a resolution for investigation as relevant to the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, and when he further states that his resolution is a substitute for that offered by the Senator from Kentucky, I offer my amendment, and I will explain the relevancy of the amendment I have had the honor to offer when he shows that his proposition is relevant to the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky.

In what the Senator from Virginia has said about civil service I cordially and honestly concur. The workings of the system enacted by the civil-service law have corroborated all that I have expected and all that I said on this floor in regard to it at the time the law was passed. The principle of civil-service reform is right; the principle as inaugurated and incorporated in that measure is correct; but I said then what proves to be true, by practical experience, that in the hands of the Republican party that law is a fraud, a delusion, and a snare.

The Democratic Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate retained on the rolls of the Senate when he had absolute control of the offices here nearly one-half of the employés put in by the Republican party. What do we see to-day? We see the guillotine working morning, noon, and night. Even the poor Africans, the especial pets and protégés and wards of the Republican party, who are assumed to be Republicans on account of their color, who have been told by the great Republican leaders of the direful consequences which would ensue to them if they dared vote the Democratic ticket—even they are removed, as the Senator from Kentucky said, their superior officers remonstrating against it. Why was the colored man referred to by the Senator from Kentucky put out? The Senator from Virginia indignantly supplements his statement by the assertion that in Virginia the Federal patronage has not been misused. We know the allegation on that subject. Whether it is true or not, personally I know nothing about; I simply want to know, like the Senator from Virginia, whether civil-service reform is a fraud and a humbug or not. If patronage has been used in any State of this Union for political purposes, it is a monstrous outrage, not only upon civil-service reform, but upon our form of government itself. If what the Senator from Virginia says be correct—and I have no personal knowledge one way or the other—my amendment can do no harm except to bring a glorious vindication to him and the party to which he belongs. I want to know what the facts are; bring them before the public and let the public judge. For myself and the party with which I act, I have no disposition to avoid any investigation or to shrink from any responsibility. I voted the other day against the resolution in regard to the riot at Danville because I honestly thought no investigation would give to us any facts except such as were then before the Senate. I believe so yet. I think I can state now what the report of that committee will be. But if the Senator wants a fair and full investigation into this matter, let it be had.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, this is rather an unprofitable discussion about a subject concerning which we are not in possession of sufficient information to vote intelligently. I therefore move to refer the resolution of the Senator from Virginia, with the amendment submitted by the Senator from Missouri, to the Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas to refer as stated by him.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I should like to correct what I consider to be a misunderstanding or misconception of the Senator from Missouri in regard to the removals for political causes of employés of the Senate in 1879, when the Democratic party came into power in the Senate and did make changes. I understood the Senator to state that there were but three or four Republicans removed at that time.

Mr. VEST. I did not make any such statement.

Mr. CONGER. Perhaps the Senator will repeat the statement he did make.

Mr. VEST. I never heard that statement till now. I never made any such statement as that there were but three or four Republicans removed. I did not undertake to state the number. I said a large amount, I think nearly one-half the patronage of the Senate, remained in the possession of Republicans.

Mr. CONGER. That will answer the purpose of my comments just as well as if the Senator had said three or four. It is perhaps a little better to have it fixed at one-half.

In this connection I desire to recall to the recollection of gentlemen before this resolution goes to the committee the action of the Senate when the majority became Democratic in 1879 and the resolution adopted by the Senate changing the rules of the Senate from having the appointments concurred in by the President of the Senate of one political party and having them made by the Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms just elected of another political faith. That resolution should be brought up once in a while that we may see how the advocates on the Democratic side of this Chamber for enforcing the spirit and the letter of the civil-service rules understood then the principle of it. Their action then should receive their attention now and should be known by the country.

The resolution offered by Mr. Wallace, of Pennsylvania, April 17, 1879, changing the rules of the Senate, reads as follows:

Resolved, That the several officers and others in the departments of the Secretary of the Senate and of the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be appointed and removed from office by those officers respectively.

Taking away the approval of the presiding officer of the Senate who at that time was a Republican, and giving the sole power to these officers of the Senate who were at that time Democrats. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] offered an amendment to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert:

That in the opinion of the Senate, the correct and safe transaction of the business of the Senate is materially dependent on retaining in its service a corps of experienced, well-trained, and diligent officers, and this can only be done by security in their respective positions so long as they continue faithful in the discharge of their duties.

This amendment was modified, on motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON], by adding:

And acceptable to a majority of the Senators.

I find by following through the RECORD for the result of that vote that all the Democrats, including the Senator from Kentucky, whose name I remember, though I have not the list before me, voted against the Edmunds amendment and voted for the Wallace resolution.

In pursuance of that resolution—I have not the list of changes in the Sergeant-at-Arms' department, but I will obtain it for another occasion—the Secretary of the Senate removed twenty Republican clerks and left four Republican clerks, instead of one-half. The spirit which prompted those removals by the Secretary of the Senate is best explained in a letter signed by him bearing date May 13, 1879. The part of it referring to this matter I feel that it would be gratifying to my Democratic friends and certainly refreshing to me to put upon the record. The Secretary of the Senate says, addressing a person who was discharged from duty:

You were a short time ago verbally notified that your services in this office would soon be dispensed with. This is to notify you that from and after the 15th instant your connection with the Senate will terminate. You will then please turn over to your successor the books, papers, &c., which pertain to your desk. As I am responsible to the Senate for the faithful and efficient discharge of the duties of my subordinates, I feel that I should select them.

I may add that I believe the subordinate officers of the Senate, like the elective, should, except in exceptional cases, be in political accord with the majority of the body.

Respectfully,

JOHN C. BURCH,
Secretary United States Senate.

A similar letter was addressed to twenty old, faithful, tried employés of the Senate in pursuance of the spirit of the Wallace resolution, introduced by a Democrat, supported and carried through the Senate by the unanimous vote of the Democrats, including, as I believe and understand, the leading civil-service reformers on that side of the Chamber; and the political definition of the duty of an official elected by the Democracy to be Secretary of the Senate I suppose may be assumed to be the Simon-pure Democratic idea of civil-service reform, which is:

I believe the subordinate officers of the Senate, like the elective, should, except in exceptional cases, be in political accord with the majority of the body.

I wish to have the pleasure at some future time, if this resolution should be reported back, as I hope it may be and be open to some remarks, of recalling to the memory of Senators their votes upon the Wallace resolution, and perhaps some striking remarks made at that time defining their views as to the true spirit and intent of civil-service reform at that time as compared with the very earnest advocacy and support of civil-service reform now.

I can not avoid taking this occasion to say that so far as I have known either in the Senate or in the House, I have never heard advocated or proposed by any Democrat in either body a proposition which should control in any manner the appointments made either by the President or by the officers of these Houses which would not have the direct tendency to turn out Republicans and put in Democrats, or at least in the new appointments that were to be made to make it so that Democrats should have an opportunity of coming in by law under these appointments. I find it so all through, and they resist all amendments looking to enforcing a rule which should work against the Democracy instead of against the Republicans as a party. Knowing this, I have a right to have some little question about the general sincerity—I do not mean personally, for I am not going to put myself in any personal hostility or question with any other Senator—I have some reason to question the general desire, the virtuous indignation to favor civil-service reform where it would hurt one's own party and to be zealous for it where it would injure the opponents. For that reason I have some question about some of the remarks that I hear here on these subjects.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the first bill or resolution upon the Calendar of General Orders.

Mr. CONGER. When this subject comes up again in the morning hour I desire to retain the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator from Michigan will be, as is usual, allowed to finish his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the Senator from Michigan proceeding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONGER. I would sooner take up this subject to-morrow after some chance for reflection in a quiet way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first bill or resolution on the Calendar of General Orders will be read.

CHARTS OF HYDROGRAPHIC OFFICE.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill reported by the Committee on Printing in regard to the charts of the Hydrographic Office.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1293) providing for distribution to members of Congress of ten charts and other publications of the Hydrographic Office for each session of Congress.

Mr. INGALLS. I should be very glad if this bill could be so amended as to authorize the distribution of these charts to those who want them. I am very sure that to nine-tenths at least of the members of the House and Senate this addition to the amount of trash, the avalanche of printed matter that comes to us, will be a great burden. The majority of those Senators and Representatives who live in the interior States never would have a demand for one of these charts from one year's end to the other. If some arrangement can be made by which they can be sent to mariners, to navigators, and to those who are interested in commerce, I wish the committee would have an amendment made to that end; I would cordially vote for it; but I say frankly that so far as I am concerned I do not want to be burdened with them, and I am very sure I speak the sentiments of a majority of those who live away from the coast.

Mr. HOAR. I was about to suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Printing a change in the phraseology of this bill. It is a very trifling matter, but I suppose it is a phraseology which will be pursued in other matters as it is in this. The provision is that each Senator and Representative shall be entitled to so many, as if it were a matter of property in the Senator. It seems to me that the law should provide that these charts may be distributed on the direction of each Senator and Representative.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to that amendment. The amendment the Senator from Kansas proposes is not necessary. The Senators, Representatives, and Delegates are not to have ten copies of each chart sent to them, but they are to be entitled to call for ten copies of the charts at large for each session. That is the rule in the Coast Survey.

Mr. INGALLS. Under the provisions of this bill, if it pass, we shall be notified that ten copies of these charts and publications are at our disposal and asked what disposition we wish to have made of them, as we are of a vast number of the publications of other Departments of the Government that are of no use except to those who reside in certain localities. I have already received during the last two or three weeks a number of charts advising me of the position of wrecks in the North Atlantic Ocean, a large map of that watery territory, with buoys and figures and designations showing the condition of wrecks since the last map was issued. Of course it is gratifying to me to be advised on those points; but as only very few of my immediate constituents are concerned in navigation, I am at a loss to know what to do with the publications, and I should be glad to be relieved from the receipt of further publications of that office. I would turn them over with great pleasure to any Senator who desires to receive them.

Mr. ANTHONY. These charts are of no use to the Senator from Kansas, but they are of enormous use to navigators.

Mr. INGALLS. Why should they not have them? Why should they be turned over to Senators?

Mr. ANTHONY. They are not, unless you send for them.

Mr. INGALLS. I have not sent for them; they have been sent to my room.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suppose the Department desired the Senator to know what they were doing; it was a sort of report of their proceedings to show how they were spending the money appropriated.

Mr. INGALLS. One copy is a burden, and ten would be a calamity.

Mr. ANTHONY. A single one may have been sent, but no number will be sent unless they are applied for. The Hydrographic Office is doing an immense work for the safety of navigation, for the security of property, and for the salvation of human life.

Mr. INGALLS. I am not indifferent to that, but I think these publications ought to go where they are needed.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is to send them where they are needed. If the Senator from Kansas does not want his, I shall want them, and will be glad to get them.

Mr. INGALLS. I am not anxious to make a donation to anybody. I shall be glad to have the law so changed that persons who want these publications can receive them, but not to say that each Senator and Representative shall be entitled to them.

Mr. CONGER. To obviate the objection to this measure which I have introduced I will move, with the permission of the chairman of the Committee on Printing, to amend it by saying, "entitled upon application."

Mr. HOAR. I would suggest an amendment which I was about to submit to the consideration of the Senate. The fourth line reads, "shall each be entitled to ten charts." I move to insert, after the word "to," the words "direct the distribution of;" so as to read, "shall each be entitled to direct the distribution of ten charts or other publications of the Hydrographic Office."

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I will make no objection; but I think when application is made by literary societies and by persons interested in navigation, as in the case I cited, that led to the introduction of this bill, it might be well to allow them to have charts at the request of members of Congress. They would not be troubled very much of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], which will be reported.

Mr. CONGER. I prefer my own proposition.

Mr. HOAR. Before the amendment is reported, allow me to say to the Senate that under the rule which now exists in regard to the census reports and the records of the war of the rebellion and the universal practice, if you send to the Hydrographic Office for these publications the office will send them with a letter stating that they are sent at your request. That is much more convenient it seems to me than it is to send to the office and have the things sent to the Senators and then compel them to send them off.

Mr. CONGER. That may be a better way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Michigan as proposing an amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I did, and I will still ask the Senate to adopt it. I move to insert the words "on application" after the word "entitled," so as to read "shall each be entitled on application to ten charts." Then the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts can be offered. I think it makes the bill better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan was entitled to the floor, and if he offered an amendment which the Chair did not understand, the Chair will treat the amendment as in order prior to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONGER. I am satisfied with either.

Mr. ANTHONY. Take them both.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Michigan will be reported.

Mr. HOAR. I understood the Senator would withdraw his amendment, and I think if he will hear mine he will find that it includes and covers his.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will report both amendments for the information of the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. Let the bill be read as it would stand if amended by both.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 4, after the word "entitled," it is moved to insert "upon application;" so as to read:

That Senators, Representatives, and Delegates to the House of Representatives shall each be entitled upon application to ten charts or other publications of the Hydrographic Office for each regular session of Congress.

The other amendment is after the word "to," in line 4, to insert "direct the distribution of," and after the word "office," in line 5, to insert "by the office;" so as to read:

That Senators, Representatives, and Delegates to the House of Representatives shall each be entitled to direct the distribution of ten charts or other publications of the Hydrographic Office, by the office, for each regular session of Congress.

Mr. CONGER. I think it would be better to leave out the words "application of."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan withdraw his amendment?

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOAR, the title was amended so as to read:

A bill providing for distribution by members of Congress of ten charts and other publications of the Hydrographic Office, for each session of Congress.

SPECIAL ASSISTANT ATTORNEYS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the first bill or resolution in order on the Calendar of General Orders, being the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] January 8, 1884, directing the Committee on the Judiciary to examine and report what legislation, if any, is necessary to restrict the appointment of special assistant attorneys, &c.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Do we not proceed now under Rule VIII, it being after 2 o'clock, and not under Rule IX?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Rule IX applies after 2 o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] that the bill (S. 1115) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations might properly be brought up now as well as at any time. The Senate seems to be without any special business this afternoon, and I suggest to the Senator to call up the bill reported by him in regard to the circulating notes of national banks.

Mr. BAYARD. That was made the special order for Wednesday next.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I object to that coming up now. I think we ought to keep to the Calendar. We have hardly touched the Calendar for a week.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to going on with the Calendar, but there seemed to be a lull here.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. There is no lull. The first order on the Calendar was called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first business in order on the Calendar of General Orders under Rule IX will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. VAN WYCK January 8, 1884:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to examine and report what legislation, if any, is necessary to restrict the appointment of special assistant attorneys and special agents or detectives in the Department of Justice, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. INGALLS. The mover of the resolution is not in his seat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection to its being adopted.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

Mr. COCKRELL. The next two cases on the Calendar need not be called. They were reported adversely from the Committee on Claims, and as soon as they can be examined will probably be stricken from the docket.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They are in order on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection does not avail.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that they be passed over.

Mr. HARRISON. To what numbers does the Senator from Missouri refer?

Mr. COCKRELL. Numbers 36 and 37 in the order of business.

Mr. HOAR. Order of Business No. 36 is the report of a case which depends upon a principle which the Senate has again and again adopted. While of course the Senator from Missouri may desire further inquiry and nobody will object, still it seems to me these ought to be off the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. I simply desire to say that one of the reports I have not looked at. The gentleman is living here in the city, as the Senator knows, and I want to learn his pleasure about the matter. I do not propose to have the bill called up.

Mr. HOAR. I was speaking of No. 36.

Mr. COCKRELL. I propose to have them stricken from the Calendar—that is, indefinitely postponed—as soon as I have time to examine the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to formally passing over the two bills mentioned by the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears none.

DURATION OF PATENTS.

The next bill in order on the Calendar was the bill (S. 672) to amend section 4887 of the Revised Statutes, in relation to patents, the consideration of which was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. I confess very frankly that I can not see any necessity for this bill. It does seem to me an extension of rights and privileges which should not be granted. I believe there is no written report. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] made some explanation of it which I have not had time yet to read. I should like to have the second section of the bill read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The second section will be read.

Mr. PLATT. There is no second section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is but one section in the bill. Does the Senator from Missouri desire to have the bill reported?

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to have the latter part of the bill reported.

Mr. PLATT. Commencing in line 23——

Mr. COCKRELL. Commencing in line 23.

The Secretary read as follows:

No patent granted for an invention which had, prior to the grant of such patent, been first patented in a foreign country, and which has not expired at the date of the passage of this act, shall be declared to be invalid by reason of its not being so limited on its face or in its grant as to expire at the same time with the foreign patent, or, if there be more than one, at the same time with the one having the shortest term: but this section shall in no wise renew, revive, prolong, or extend any patent heretofore granted.

Mr. GARLAND. I want to call the attention of the committee that reported this bill to the language used in it and also in the statute of which this is amendatory. "Public use" is a question which has troubled the courts a good deal. I remember now, without calling to mind particularly the name of the case, a decision by Judge Blatchford, just before he went off the circuit bench, giving a definite meaning and expression to that term "public use." I should like to know if the committee had its attention called to this expression in the bill and in the law of which it is amendatory. There should be some rule prescribed or some definition given so as not to leave the language to the wide range it is now. I think the case I have reference to is probably in 13 Blatchford's Reports.

Mr. PLATT. I do not remember the case to which the Senator from Arkansas refers, and I do not know that the attention of the committee was specially called to what legal construction may have been given to the clause "two years' use" or "in use for two years;" but I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that this bill is intended only for a certain and specific object, and the language in this bill with regard to a patent's having been introduced into public use in the United States for more than two years would of course mean just what it means in the present statute. We do not propose by this bill to legislate upon that subject. It is only to correct what we think is wrong in the present statute resulting from the decisions of the courts and to make the statute just what it is conceded on all hands the parties drafting the statute intended.

Mr. GARLAND. I understand the theory on which the bill is based and I agree to it. I think myself it corrects an evil that should be corrected, but I wanted to know if the chairman representing the committee had had his attention called to this other point, as I think it should be looked after by the committee. If its attention had not been called to it I desired that now it should be, because it gives rise to a great deal of trouble in patent cases at times.

Mr. PLATT. The committee will be very glad to give its attention to the matter suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, but the Senator will see that we can not very well correct in this bill any difficulty which exists in law respecting that.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire simply to say that I shall vote against the bill, and I record myself accordingly.

The bill was passed.

LOUISA BODDY.

The bill (S. 271) for the relief of Louisa Boddy was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Louisa Boddy, of Lake County, Oregon, $5,400, in full settlement of her claim against the Government for depredations committed and property taken and destroyed by the Modoc Indians on or about November 29, 1872.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a report.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read. I should like to know something about the ground on which the bill is based.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. SLATER January 15, 1884.

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 271) for the relief of Mrs. Louisa Boddy, of Oregon, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

It appears by the petition of Mrs. Louisa Boddy, that her husband together with a son-in-law and one grown son became settlers upon the public lands of the United States in the valley of Lost River, in Lake County, Oregon, some four months prior to the commencement of the late Modoc Indian war, which said war began November 29, 1872, and terminated in June, 1873. Long prior to said settlement the Indian title to said lands had been extinguished by a treaty with the Klamath, Modoc, and other Indians, which said treaty was signed October 14, 1864, and ratified by the United States Senate July 2, 1866. Said lands were afterward surveyed by the United States and opened to settlement in 1869.

On the 6th of August, 1872, the Boddy family, consisting of the husband of the petitioner, her son-in-law, Nicholas Schira, and wife, who was the daughter of the petitioner, and her two sons, one a minor, made settlement on said lands.

On the 29th of November, 1872, the Government undertook, with an inadequate military force, consisting of James Jackson, First United States Cavalry, and thirty-five men, to remove by force the Modoc Indians from said public lands, where they had been roaming contrary to the injunctions of the Indian agent having charge of them, to the Klamath reservation. Such an insignificant force could not and did not have any effect to intimidate the Indians. The result was that Indian hostilities were at once precipitated, and a most cruel slaughter immediately commenced by those Indians upon the unoffending and unsuspecting settlers of Lost River Valley, which slaughter began immediately after the attack upon Captain Jack's camp by Lieutenant Jackson on the morning of November 29, 1872, at early light. Among those who were massacred were the husband of the petitioner, her two sons, and her son-in-law, who were peaceably pursuing their usual vocations.

The petitioner further states in a graphic manner her discovery of the lifeless forms of her husband and sons, stripped and mutilated, and how, struck with fear, she and her daughter fled at once to the neighboring mountains, where, without food or shelter and thinly clad, with snow on the ground, they remained for two days before daring to make their way to any friendly shelter.

After the massacre the Indians destroyed and carried off all the personal property of the families, embracing horses, sheep, hogs, cattle, poultry, clothing, provisions, &c., and also including $829 in gold and silver coin, and burned the houses. The mutilated bodies of those who were killed were afterward recovered and buried at Linkville by the Oregon volunteers.

By this disaster the petitioner was reduced at once from a condition of comparative affluence to one of poverty and wretchedness.

The petitioner duly presented her claim for property thus stolen and destroyed, amounting to $6,180, in due form to the Indian Bureau, and placed a duplicate copy thereof in the hands of the local Indian agent. No relief, however, of any kind has ever been received by her. She therefore appeals to Congress.

This petition is sustained by the names of one hundred substantial citizens of Oregon, and residents of Lake County and vicinity, including Jesse Applegate, one of the Modoc peace commissioners; L. S. Dyar, Indian agent at the time of the massacre; J. H. Rook, Indian agent at the time of signing the petition; S. B. Cranston, register of the United States land office; and Quincy A. Brooks, assistant quartermaster-general of Oregon volunteers, who certify "that the facts set forth in said petition are correct and true."

In forwarding to the Indian Department the claim of Mrs. Boddy for depredations committed by the Modoc Indians, as before stated, the local Indian agent, Mr. Dyar, wrote as follows to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs:

KLAMATH AGENCY, OREGON, April 24, 1876.

SIR: I inclose herewith papers relating to claims of Mrs. Louisa Boddy and Mrs. Kate Nurse for depredations committed by the Modoc Indians.

I have examined them, and find that the prices charged for hay, flour, groceries, and sheep are not above the ruling rates at the time and place of the depredations. I am knowing to the fact that these claimants were great sufferers from the Modocs; that their husbands and other members of their families were murdered and much of their property destroyed by these Indians.

I am unable to present the case to the Indians, as required in article 4 of rules and regulations of the Department relative to such claims, as the perpetrators are now located upon the Quapaw reservation, in the Indian Territory.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

L. S. DYAR,
United States Indian Agent.

Hon. J. Q. SMITH,
Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

In addition to the foregoing are affidavits of four disinterested citizens, M. Hartery, John Fritz, Dan Calwell, and W. S. Bybee, who were the nearest neighbors to the Boddy settlement, who testify to the amount and character of the property destroyed as near as the circumstances of the case would admit. Mrs. Boddy's own affidavit, made in this city during the present session of Congress, also gives further particulars and satisfactory account of all the circumstances of her losses.

In view of the premises, and in consideration of the whole case, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, on request of the Secretary of the Interior, communicated under date of March 10, 1882, the following letter, which has been submitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs, to wit:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, March 10, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to be in receipt, by Department's reference for report, of a petition (herewith inclosed) to Congress by Mrs. Louisa Boddy, of Lake County, Oregon, praying for compensation for losses and injuries inflicted by Modoc Indians in November, 1872. A duplicate of this petition, together with other papers in the case (some of which had before been in this office, and were submitted to the Department June 12, 1876, for transmittal to Congress), were also filed in this office yesterday by J. F. Kinney, attorney for Mrs. Boddy. These papers are also herewith inclosed. Among them is a copy of the report of this office, above referred to, of June 12, 1876, upon the claim of Mrs. Boddy, which had been filed in this office for preliminary examination under the laws and departmental regulations governing the settlement of Indian-depredation claims, and, as will be seen, upon the papers then before one of my predecessors he arrived at the following conclusion:

"There is, therefore, no doubt as to the fact of the depredation, but there is no reliable evidence in the case to show the extent of it or the amount and value of the property lost. I can not, therefore, do otherwise than recommend a disallowance of the claim. The depredation was committed in November, 1872, and the claim was not presented for adjustment until April last (1876), and is therefore barred."

By reference to the declaration and proofs of the claimant upon which my predecessors acted (see papers marked A, herewith), it will be seen that four witnesses to the depredation were M. Hartery, John Fritz, Dan Calwell, and W. S. Bybee, who could not swear that they knew of their own personal knowledge that the identical property enumerated in the schedule sworn to by Mrs. Boddy was the property destroyed by the Modocs, but they swear they were neighbors of William Boddy, deceased, and know that "valuable property belonging to said affiant (Louisa Boddy) was destroyed, injured, or taken away" by the hostile Modocs, and that "they believe the foregoing statement of articles destroyed, injured, or taken away by said Indians, together with the value thereof, and of each and every item of said account, as set forth in the foregoing affidavit (the affidavit of Mrs. Boddy), to be correct and true."

Their inability to swear with more particularity, and the impracticability of obtaining more specific evidence, are explained by the petition of Mrs. Boddy to Congress and by her affidavit dated 5th instant in this city, which, of course, were not before my predecessor when he acted on the case. Particular attention is invited to these. They show that the husband of Mrs. Boddy, her two sons, aged respectively eighteen and twenty-two years, and her son-in-law, who constituted all the men in their immediate settlement, and who perhaps alone could have sworn to the exact amount of stock owned by Mr. Boddy, and the exact number destroyed, stolen, or lost, were killed on the 29th of November, when the loss occurred; that her daughter (her only remaining child) and herself, upon seeing the Indians stripping the dead bodies of her son and son-in-law, fled to the mountains to keep from being murdered, and remained there two days without food or shelter and thinly clad, with snow on the ground; that the witnesses W. S. Bybee and Dan Calwell who were her nearest neighbors, lived three miles south of the Boddy settlement, and that Mr. Hartery and John Fritz, who were her nearest neighbors on the north, lived five and ten miles distant, respectively, and that these witnesses, as soon as practicable after the massacre, assisted in collecting the scattered stock belonging to the Boddy family; that they were frequent visitors at the home of Mrs. Boddy before the massacre and depredation, and that "each of the said men had a good idea of the amount and value of the property and stock" owned by the family, and also were the only persons, except Mrs. Boddy and her daughter, who had knowledge of the amount of stock recovered.

These papers also show that William Boddy and family removed from Roseburg, Oreg., where he had been engaged in merchandising, to the farm occupied by them when he was killed, only about four months before the massacre, taking with him the remnants of a stock of goods pertaining to a general country store, about three thousand sheep, about seventy-five head of cattle, and about thirty-five head of horses. The claim made by Mrs. Boddy includes only five horses, one cow, and five hundred sheep, the inference being that the balance of the stock was recovered.

The remainder of the claim, as presented to this office for settlement, embraces such articles as would naturally be found in the house of a man engaged as Mr. Boddy had previously been and was at the time of his massacre.

The respectability of Mrs. Boddy, and the truthfulness of her statement as to the loss of property, is abundantly attested by the signatures of about one hundred persons attached to her petition, and among them that of L. S. Dyar, who was the agent for these Indians in 1872, when the depredation was committed, and who under date of April 24, 1876, in reporting to this office upon this claim, said that the "prices charged for hay, flour, groceries, and sheep are not above the ruling rates at the time and place of the depredations." In that letter he also states, from personal knowledge, that Mrs. Boddy was a great sufferer from the Modocs, and that much of her property was destroyed by these Indians.

From the evidence now before me I am satisfied that the property mentioned in the schedule found in the paper marked A belonged to William Boddy (husband of Mrs. Louisa Boddy) in his lifetime, and was lost or destroyed as stated in the papers in the case; but the vagueness as to the amounts of quite a number of the articles mentioned leads me to think that in all probability the actual value of some of these articles at least has been overestimated, and that the sum of $5,400 would cover the loss; and I therefore respectfully recommend that the papers herewith be returned to the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, with the request that an appropriation of that amount be made in favor of Mrs. Louisa Boddy, widow of William Boddy, deceased.

It is proper to state that in view of the fact that ever since the Modocs who perpetrated the depredation under consideration were removed to the Indian Territory they have been regarded by this office and by Congress as having forfeited all right to any of the benefits inuring to other Modocs under the treaty of October 14, 1864, with the Klamath, Modoc, and other Indians (16 Statutes, page 707) and have been assisted in self-support by a small gratuity annually appropriated by Congress; so that it would seem that the amount which may be appropriated for the relief of Mrs. Boddy should be taken from the public funds. It may be proper to state also that the limitation of time (three years) fixed by the seventeenth section of the act of June 30, 1834 (4 Statutes, page 732), within which Indian depredation claims may be presented no longer obtains, as this limitation is omitted in the Revised Statutes.

Since the foregoing was written the attorney for Mrs. Boddy has presented a brief in support of the claim, which is also herewith transmitted.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. PRICE, Commissioner.

Hon. S. J. KIRKWOOD,
Secretary of the Interior.

From all the facts in this case it is quite apparent that the massacre of the settlers on Lost River by the Modocs on the 29th of November, 1872, was not the result of an ordinary outbreak of those Indians, but the direct result of the attack of the United States troops upon their camp on the morning of that day, with inadequate force, for the purpose of their removal to the Klamath reservation, whither they refused to go, which attempt upon the part of the military authority was made without notice to the settlers scattered along Lost River. Your committee think that this fact makes this an exceptional case, and gives this claimant an equitable right to relief, and therefore fully concur with the Commissioner in his recommendation that the sum of $5,400 be appropriated for the relief of Mrs. Louisa Boddy, widow of William Boddy, deceased, in full compensation of her losses as hereinbefore stated, and therefore report for that purpose the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is absolutely necessary that in this body we shall have some regularity of proceeding and some system and order. This bill does not belong to the Committee on Indian Affairs; it belongs to the Committee on Claims. This is not a proposition to take funds out of the annuities or appropriations for the support of the Indians to pay this claim. If it were, the Committee on Indian Affairs would have jurisdiction; but this is a direct proposition to take the people's money and pay for this Indian depredation. I say that it has been the universal rule in the Senate that all claims of that class (and they are not one, but they amount to ten millions of dollars) go to the Committee on Claims. This claim belongs to that committee, and it should be referred to that committee, so that we may have uniformity of action upon this class of claims. I appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Claims, who is present, if all this class of claims have not been before that committee?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I must answer that they have not. There has really been no uniformity in the matter. When a claim for Indian depredations has been referred to the Committee on Claims and it appears that the claim is to be paid out of a fund belonging to the Indian tribe, that committee has, I think, uniformly reported the bill back to the Senate and asked to be excused from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, whenever the attention of the committee was called to that feature of the claim. But I must say that there really has been no uniformity about it. I think the point had better not be made now, because all the facts connected with this case are before the Senate, and the Senate is just as well prepared to pass upon the bill as it would be if the report had come from another committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want to know distinctly whether the Committee on Claims, that has jurisdiction of all these matters, intends to tell the people of this country that they shall be taxed $10,000,000 to pay for Indian depredations. That is what this bill means, nothing less and nothing more. This is an assumption on the part of the Senate of liability for all Indian depredations.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Not at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. You can not make it anything else. Here is a naked, simple depredation claim, and no annuity and no appropriation for the benefit of the Indians out of which the payment is to come. The hardship is apparent, and so it is with all Indian depredations. There are pending eight or ten million dollars of these claims, as Senators well posted in these matters are aware, and I want to know if we are to say that Indian depredations are to be paid for. If they are, I want a general bill brought in to pay for all, and not to make fish of one and flesh of another.

Mr. SLATER. The point that the Senator from Missouri makes was expressly and fully considered by the committee. It was held by the committee that this formed an exception to the rule that he states, and the exception arose from the fact that the breaking out of the Indians was rather induced by the action of the United States authorities in not giving notice to the settlers in the vicinity when they began the attack upon the Indians themselves, and by that means the United States placed itself in a position to be responsible for all the immediate damages at that point. They began with an inadequate force and undertook to remove the Indians when they ought to have known they could not do it with the force at their command. They did it without notice to the settlers, and they did it with the certainty, if they had looked at things properly, that the result which followed must necessarily have followed. The report makes that point in the concluding paragraph:

From all the facts in this case it is quite apparent that the massacre of the settlers on Lost River by the Modocs, on the 29th of November, 1872, was not the result of an ordinary outbreak of those Indians, but the direct result of the attack of the United States troops upon their camp on the morning of that day, with inadequate force, for the purpose of their removal to the Klamath reservation, whither they refused to go, which attempt upon the part of the military authority was made without notice to the settlers scattered along Lost River.

The history that followed afterward showed that the force which made the attack were scarcely able to take care of themselves, let alone taking care of the settlers in the immediate vicinity, and that it was one of those unfortunate mistakes which occasionally occur in the history of nations. The committee regarded this as a plain case. The facts show one of very great merit, and one of very great hardship if relief is not to be given. I hope the bill will be passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon who is on the Committee on Indian Affairs if there has been any Indian war in the memory of man that was not supposed to be brought on, directly or indirectly, by the United States authorities, the Indian agent, some contractor, or somebody who wanted the war?

Mr. SLATER. That is hardly a fair question in a case like this, but I can say to the Senator that I know of some cases, among which this is one, in which undoubtedly the war began by the action of the Government itself and by the unfortunate and indiscreet action of the Government and its agents.

Mr. DAWES. There is a great deal of truth in what the Senator from Missouri says in reference to Indian wars, but the rule to which he has called the attention of the Senate and all that matter was in consideration by the committee when they decided to report this bill. They did not overlook the rule and did not overlook the extent of the claims that under the rule might be made upon the Treasury. Yet they thought that this was clearly outside of the rule and was founded in so strong an equity that the Senate of this year, like the Senate of last year, would not hesitate to say that when the troops of the United States from a very indiscreet and unwise use of their force had put, as it were, this woman's whole estate to exposure and destruction in order to carry out their command—and whether the war was brought on, as I will not stop to inquire, by the whites or by the Indians themselves—when the proceeds of all that property went into the Treasury of the United States, the loss that was brought upon this poor family by the exposure that our troops put them to, it was not a great stretch of equity, it would be a denial of justice if a portion of that property might not be taken out of the Treasury to remunerate this family.

Mr. JACKSON. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs what amount of annuity was forfeited by that tribe?

Mr. DAWES. I am unable to state exactly, but a large sum, covering a great deal more than any destruction of private property growing out of the war.

Mr. JACKSON. Is there any annuity now being paid to them?

Mr. DAWES. No; they have been sent off into exile down in the Indian Territory, and are not a charge, as I understand it, upon the Government.

Mr. COCKRELL. They are supported by the Government now, are they not? Appropriations are made every year for their support instead of their annuities.

Mr. SLATER. Annually, for all.

Mr. COCKRELL. I doubt not they are getting more from the Government now than they did before they fought it.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, it seems impossible that a claim can be made upon the Government for compensation for losses from Indian depredations without being met at once with the suggestion from some quarter that the depredations were suffered on account of wrongs committed by the white man toward the Indian. I am not satisfied to allow this bill to be submitted to the Senate without a fuller statement in regard to this particular transaction. I must speak in the main from memory, having been somewhat familiar with the history of this matter at the time.

In October, 1864, a treaty was negotiated between the Klamath and Modoc tribes of Indians by which both of those tribes agreed to go upon the reservation known as the Klamath Indian reservation, in Southeastern Oregon, and ceded to the United States their title or right to possession, whichever you please to call it, to the lands outside of the reservation previously occupied by them. In 1866 that treaty was ratified by the Senate with certain amendments. In 1869 the treaty as amended by the Senate was ratified and signed by the chiefs and headmen of both tribes, and the Modocs and Klamaths went upon the reservation and placed themselves under the control of the Indian agent, and agreed to remain there subject to his control. The Government caused the lands ceded by those Indian tribes to the United States to be surveyed, and invited settlers to go upon them. Among the settlers who went upon these lands was the husband of this Mrs. Boddy and one of her grown sons and her son-in-law. Shortly after those Indians had gone upon the reservation where, as I contend, the United States undertook to keep them; where it had in substance agreed with every man, woman, and child who went on the land so thrown open to settlement that it would keep them, Captain Jack, one of the chiefs of the Modoc tribe, with about sixty desperate followers, left the reservation and went back upon those lands in the vicinity of Lost River, and there for a period of two years and over they terrorized over the inhabitants. The inhabitants petitioned the Government for protection, they petitioned the Indian agent, they petitioned the commander of the Department of the Columbia. Their petitions and communications were sent to the Indian Department, and negotiations were had from time to time with this band to get them back upon the reservation, and to induce them to submit themselves to the control of the Indian agent in accordance with the treaty, but they were obstinate and sullen, and refused to comply with the provisions of the treaty, and declined to go back upon the reservation. They committed various depredations in the neighborhood, drew arms upon the settlers, and threatened to take their lives. For nearly three years the Government allowed these Indians to remain outside of the reservation, until this little band of marauders had come to think that they could defy the Government of the United States. I undertake to say that it was the duty of the United States to have placed those Indians back upon the reservation and to have protected those settlers, and if it failed to do that it ought to pay the settlers, its own citizens, for all damages suffered from the depredations caused by its failure to do so.

I desire to read briefly from the petition of the settlers about this time sent to the Hon. A. B. Meacham, superintendent of Indian affairs in Oregon, and General Canby, commanding the Department of the Columbia:

We, the undersigned, citizens of Lost and Link River, Klamath and Tule Lake country, after suffering years of annoyance from the presence of the Modoc Indians, who, through the delay of the Indian and Military Department, have not been removed to the reservation, as required by the treaty stipulations of 1864, entered into by the authorized agents of the Government and the chiefs of the Modoc Indians, by which all their lands were ceded to the United States, except those embraced in the reservation, as stipulated in said treaty. But notwithstanding all the conditions of said treaty have been faithfully performed on the part of the Government, it is a well-known fact that a factious band of the Modocs, of about three hundred, who were parties to that treaty, have, through the influence of citizens of an adjoining State who have been engaged in an illict traffic with them, been instigated to set the authority of the Government at defiance, and to utterly refuse compliance with their treaty stipulations by going on the reservation; and since there is no longer any conflict between the Indian and Military Departments, such as prevent Subagent Applegate from bringing those Indians on the reservation, we therefore make this earnest appeal to you for relief. Knowing that you have the cavalry force we petitioned to be sent to Fort Klamath two years ago for this specific purpose at your command, we ask you to use it for the purpose it was procured for; that the departments, both civil and military, have not been kept ignorant of the fact that we have been repeatedly on the verge of a desolating Indian war with this band of outlaws, who, by your delay to enforce the treaty, have been led to despise, rather than respect, the authority of the Government.

Their long-continued success in defying its authorities has emboldened them in their defiant and hostile bearing, until further forbearance on our part would cease to be a virtue; that, in many instances, our families have become alarmed at their threats to kill and burn, until we were compelled to remove them for safety across the Cascade Mountains, thereby suffering great loss of time and property. That the agents at Klamath and commissary at Yainax, during this long delay growing out of this unfortunate conflict of Departments, have done all they could to prevent a war and bring about an amicable adjustment of our troubles we have no reason to doubt; but we ask now, since no such conflict exists, shall a petty Indian chief, with twenty desperadoes, and a squalid band of three hundred miserable savages, any longer set at defiance the strong arm of the Government, driving our citizens from their homes, threatening their lives, and destroying our property?

Their removal to the reservation in the winter season may be easily accomplished by any one acquainted with them and their country, and will not require more force than could be furnished from Fort Klamath to do it. We recommended Commissary I. D. Applegate, of Yainax, to the consideration of the department as a suitable man to take charge of any force or expedition looking to their removal. His long connection with the Indian Department, and thorough knowledge of them and their country and all the facts connected with this whole Modoc question, and as a stock-raiser equally interested with us in their removal, point him out to us as the right man in the right place in charge of this much-needed expedition for the removal of this band of Modocs to their reservation, for which your petitioners will ever pray.

The petition is signed by something like sixty settlers. This communication was referred to General Canby by Superintendent Meacham, and the correspondence was continued after Mr. Meacham left the service by his successor, Hon. T. B. Odeneal. The result was that after a very long delay the Government undertook to remove these Indians with an inadequate force from Lost River to the Klamath reservation. There was prior to that time no Indian war existing, but the Indians had been for years terrorizing over the settlers. The Government had neglected its duty to protect the settlers and to remove the Indians. Under our system of taking care of Indians upon reservations the Indians bind themselves to remain upon the reservation subject to the orders of the Indian agent, and, I repeat, the Government undertakes to keep them there. If property had been destroyed by a mob in any municipal corporation in this country, in a city, or a county, under circumstances not half so atrocious as the circumstances of this case, and with half the culpability of the municipal government which is shown upon the part of the United States in this matter, that municipal corporation would have been required to pay the damage.

Nothing that I could say would add weight to the story of this woman's wrongs as it is told in the report; her husband, her two sons, and her son-in-law murdered, her property destroyed, and she fleeing to the mountains amid the snows of winter to escape from the bloodthirsty savages. Independent of the question of her legal right to demand this relief, a stronger case never appealed to the Senate than the one that now appeals for relief if you put it upon the ground of a mere gratuity.

We are met in the committees and in the Senate with the proposition that the Congress of the United States reserves to itself the right to grant relief as a mere gratuity in meritorious cases independent of any legal obligation. But as I have said, I am not willing to allow this claim to be placed upon the ground of a mere gratuity. I insist that this woman has a right to compensation. I have introduced a bill into the Senate looking to the consideration of other cases of Indian depredations in Oregon and in Washington and Idaho Territories, and when the time comes for me to speak upon the question I will show not only that the right to compensation in said case has been substantially recognized by the Government in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo with Mexico, in which the United States undertakes to make the same satisfaction to Mexican citizens it does to their own citizens in like cases for depredations committed within the Mexican borders by Indians going from the territory ceded by Mexico to the United States, but that there are precedents not a few in which the Congress of the United States has granted relief in similar cases. A bill was passed providing for an examination into claims of citizens on account of Indian depredations in the State of Minnesota some years since and claims of the character of this claim to the amount of about $1,000,000 were paid by the Government.

I hope that the bill will pass, because I believe this woman has a legal right to the relief which she claims. If not, it is a case where the benevolence of the Government can be well bestowed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 355) to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 153) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish tents for the fifth annual reunion of the soldiers and sailors of the Northwest, to be held in Chicago in the month of August, 1884.

MINNESOTA INDIAN CLAIMS.

Mr. HALE. I call up the conference report on the bill for the relief of Lieutenant Greely, which has just come in from the House.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I shall be compelled to leave the city to-morrow morning, under the order of the Senate. The next bill on the Calendar is one that I reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs. I think it will pass without any objection if the Senator will delay his request for a few moments.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

The bill (S. 84) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain the amounts due to citizens of the United States for supplies furnished to the Sioux or Dakota Indians of Minnesota subsequent to August, 1860, and prior to the massacre of August, 1862, and providing for the payment thereof, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to investigate and determine the amounts due licensed traders, citizens of the United States, for supplies furnished in the course of trade and business to the Sioux or Dakota Indians of Minnesota subsequent to August, 1860, and prior to the outbreak and massacre in August, 1862, and for which damages were not awarded by the commissioners appointed under the act approved February 16, 1863, for the reason that the act limited the action of the commissioners to claims arising from depredations, and did not authorize them to act upon claims arising upon contract or upon accounts for supplies furnished; and to carry out the foregoing provisions $120,000 is appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LADY FRANKLIN BAY EXPEDITION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the following message from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the House still further insists upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions.

Mr. HALE. I now move, making the motion that I purposed making at the last sitting of the Senate when it was decided that the bill was not formally before the Senate, that the Senate recede from its amendment. I hope I do not need go over the ground that I endeavored to go over the other day. All parliamentary technicalities have been disposed of, and the bill as originally passed by the House of Representatives is before this body. A long time has elapsed since it first came up, and as I explained the other day, practically the difficulties resting in Senators minds have been removed by time. I can see no other good that has been accomplished by the delay. It may be that is enough to compensate for the loss of time in fitting out the expedition.

The men who will compose this expedition, if we send it out, will be taken not from the navy-rolls as they now stand and ordered to these seas, but will be re-enlisted. Any good man who is willing to go and is willing to re-enlist in the Navy will be put on these ships and sent to the relief of Lieutenant Greely, and no trouble it is ascertained will be found in the best officers in the establishment taking the places of responsibility provided for in the bill. There is no danger of any unwilling officer or unwilling man being ordered on the expedition, and those practical troubles being removed, it rests now with the Senate to say whether for the sake of formally adhering to its amendment providing for a volunteer force it will further imperil the fitting out of the expedition.

I know that many Senators feel that originally there should have been a limitation to the appropriation. That was all gone over and discussed and on repeated votes the Senate decided not to limit it, but to leave the responsibility, as the House of Representatives had left it, with the President, who certainly after all this discussion and all this delay will be moved by a feeling of closely scrutinizing and inspecting everything with regard to this important expedition.

I hope now in this emergency, at this exigency, that the Senate will be found ready to recede from its amendment and let the bill go through. I, for one, want no more delay. I do not know how I should feel if the expedition should go up there and it should be found that those unfortunate men had perished within a fortnight of the time when the relief reached, and that that delay had been caused by our delay here. I hope that that will not occur; I do not prophesy anything of the kind; but certainly it seems to me now that the Senate will see the importance of not further delaying this matter by insisting on its amendment. So, Mr. President, I move that the Senate recede.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do most heartily hope that the distinguished Senator from Maine will show and manifest to the country that placid, yielding spirit toward the close of this session when important controverted questions come up between the Senate and House of Representatives that he now shows in yielding to the wishes of the House. This is the second time that he has reported to this body that the House must have its own sweet will in this matter. I commend his example now to his future prayerful consideration and practice. I shall be delighted when important questions of difference come up between the Senate and House toward the close of the session to see that distinguished Senator yielding with that complacency and childlike blandness and sympathy which he exhibits in this case. The Senate has positively refused, and yet it seems that a committee of the Senate is determined to force the Senate to yield its position upon this question.

Mr. HALE. Let me interrupt the Senator there. I think the Senator could not have been here the other day when I presented the report of the conferees, simply reporting that we could not agree with the House. I stated that in making this motion I did not do it representing the committee, for I joined in the report, considering that the Senate had taken its attitude, and we declined in the conference to yield to the House. I only do this now as a member of the Senate, making the motion upon my own responsibility as a member, and not as representing the conference committee, for that is recorded as maintaining the attitude of the Senate; so that it is no attempt on the part of the conferees in any way to give away any right of the Senate. We stood for the Senate's attitude in the conference and it is so recorded.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to make an inquiry of him?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. MORRILL. What measures are they to which he refers that he is requesting the Senator from Maine to give such a cordial, yielding, humble attitude, toward the last of the session, that are to be presented from the House?

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope one of them will be a revenue-reform tariff bill.

Mr. MORRILL. If the Senator has any information in advance of all the rest of us, I think he ought to communicate it to us.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope that one of them will be a revenue-reform tariff bill and the others will be appropriation bills reducing the expenditures of the Government and bringing them to an economical and just basis.

Mr. HALE. I hope that we may have a vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the committee be discharged. I believe that motion will take precedence of the motion that is pending, and that will settle the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Maine, that the Senate recede from its amendment to the bill under consideration.

Mr. HALE. I suppose that motion has precedence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves that the committee be discharged.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the status now? Has there been a new matter brought before the Senate? Is this the same conference committee's report of disagreement that was made last week?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Secretary will report the message from the House of Representatives, which will answer the Senator's question.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House still further insists upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions.

Mr. HALE. This action is taken upon the report of the second conference. That report has been submitted to the Senate, and simply announced that the conference committee of the two Houses was unable to agree. Upon this the House has insisted upon its disagreement, and the bill comes over of course for the action of the Senate. I have made the motion that I presume takes the precedence in order to see if the two Houses may come together; that is, that the Senate recede from its amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would state to the Senator from Missouri that this is not the report of a committee of conference; it is a message from the House of Representatives declaring its action upon the subject-matter, and the motion of the Senator from Maine the Chair holds to be in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no question about it, if it is only the message that came from the House. I supposed the Senator from Maine had called up the bill we had up before. I hope the Senate will not recede, but that it will adhere to the position which it deliberately took after mature consideration and discussion.

Mr. HALE. The Senate must settle that. This matter can not be in any way advanced by any more words from me. If the Senate does not vote to recede, and holds its attitude, thinking it is worth the while to further delay this bill upon which the hearts of so many citizens all over the United States are bent, and wants to delay it further, the Senate, of course, can take that responsibility. I do not believe it is going to do it, and I am going to take up no further time, but ask for a vote upon my motion.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE. Yes; let us have the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine that the Senate recede from its amendment, upon which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. The motion is to recede from all the amendments that were agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. HALE. There is but one amendment. It is simply the question of the volunteer force. That is all the amendment there is.

Mr. COCKRELL. Did the House concur in the other amendments?

Mr. HALE. There was no amendment put on the bill by the Senate except in regard to a volunteer force, and the necessity for that has been removed. As I have already said, nobody will be ordered on the expedition who does not want to go. There are no other amendments. That is the single point.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the Senate will not recede from the amendment. I do not believe that there has been any more vicious legislation than this whole bill, and while the only fight we can now make is upon the amendment in reference to the volunteer service, I am satisfied that members of the Senate voted to pass the bill without any restriction upon the President or Secretary of the Navy in reference to the Treasury of the United States who would not do it again. I am in favor of relieving the Greely party if it can be done. I have none of the fears of the Senator from Maine that it will not be done if this bill falls to the ground. I know that the two Houses of Congress would prepare and bring in a proper bill for the relief of that party if it can be effected; but a bill has come to us without a single limitation upon the power of the Secretary of the Navy to enter the vaults of the Treasury of the United States and take ad libitum any amount of money that he may see proper while we are here in session charged with the duty of appropriating money.

Mr. BUTLER. My friend is mistaken about that, if he will pardon me. The Secretary of the Navy has nothing to do with going into the Treasury; the President has entire control.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Oh, let the Senator from South Carolina talk if he will about the President of the United States. Does he not act through the heads of Departments? Does he not act through the Secretary of the Navy? The Senator certainly tried to perpetrate a joke upon the Senate when he made that suggestion.

Mr. BUTLER. No; I assure my friend I did not seek to perpetrate a joke; I am in dead earnest.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Congress of the United States is here in session charged with the duty of making appropriations, and the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States are prohibited from taking money from the Treasury without appropriations by law; but yet we propose now to change the whole policy in this bill, and to say to the President or to the Secretary of the Navy, as I insist, "Enter the vaults of the Treasury and help yourself to any amount that you see proper."

I hope that the bill will fail and that no such bill, vicious in its character, dangerous as a precedent, will pass. The bill proposes not only to grant the Secretary of the Navy the absolute right to dispose of the treasure of the United States as he pleases, but to give him the absolute control of every officer in the naval service, so that if he has an enemy whom he wishes to punish he is given the opportunity to do it. I said some time ago that I did not know that the Secretary would do so; I do not know that he would; but I am not in favor of giving him the power to do it. If there are officers of the Navy who do not want to undertake this dangerous expedition, who do not want to separate themselves from their families and go up there and expose their lives and their health and if there are gentlemen who are willing to volunteer for the service, I prefer that those gentlemen who are willing to go shall be chosen and that no man shall be forced upon such a perilous expedition contrary to his wishes.

I hope, therefore, that the motion of the Senator from Maine will not prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that the Senate recede from its amendment, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary called the roll.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. WALKER] and also the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] are detained at their rooms by sickness.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 22; as follows:

S. W. MARSTON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the next bill on the Calendar.

The bill (S. 1035) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to settle the claims of S. W. Marston, late United States Indian agent at Union agency, Indian Territory, for services and expenses, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be examined and audited the claims of S. W. Marston, late United States Indian agent at Union agency, Indian Territory, for services rendered and expenses incurred by him in the months of July, August, September, and October, 1878, which claims were transmitted to the Office of Indian Affairs in November of that year, and to pay to him whatever sum of money may be found to be justly due for such services and expenses, not exceeding in amount $448.10.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OSCAR EASTMOND AND JAMES W. ATWILL.

The bill (S. 368) for the relief of Oscar Eastmond and James W. Atwill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to cause to be issued and delivered to Oscar Eastmond a commission as colonel and to James W. Atwill a commission as lieutenant-colonel of the First Regiment North Carolina Volunteers, to date as of June 20, 1865, and to cause them to be duly mustered out as of date June 27, 1865; but this act and the commissions and musters-out issued thereunder shall not entitle them, or either of them, or any person claiming by, through, under, or from them, or either of them, to any pay, compensation, or allowance of any kind whatever, and shall only entitle them respectively to the rank of colonel and lieutenant-colonel of the regiment named.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE A. JAEGER.

The bill (S. 439) for the relief of George A. Jaeger was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to ascertain and determine the actual value of the personal effects lost by George A. Jaeger, late a lieutenant in the Twelfth United States Infantry, by the burning of his quarters at Camp Halleck, Nevada, on October 7, 1874, without fault or neglect on his part, and to pay the amount so ascertained; but no allowance shall be made for any property except what was useful, necessary, and proper for such an officer while in quarters engaged in the service in the line of duty or exceeding in amount the sum of $500.

Mr. COCKRELL. The "J" there ought to be "I." Let it be amended accordingly. I reported the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that amendment will be made.

Mr. COCKRELL. That change should be made both in the body of the bill and in the title.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended by changing "Jaeger" to "Iaeger."

HENRY M'GOWAN.

The bill (S. 376) for the relief of Henry McGowan was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I had the honor of introducing that bill, and I prefer, although it is reported favorably, that it remain and retain its place on the Calendar, subject to be called up hereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to passing over the bill? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEWIS D. ALLEN.

The bill (S. 307) for the relief of Lewis D. Allen was announced as next in order.

Mr. HOAR. The person named in that bill, which was reported adversely, wants an opportunity to present some further evidence. I move that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to passing over informally the bill the title of which has just been read? The Chair hears none.

DAVID BALLENTINE.

The bill (S. 392) for the relief of Joseph Kinney, administrator of David Ballentine, of Missouri, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is pretty much the same kind of a case as the first one that was called, for the relief of the city of Glasgow, involving the destruction of property to prevent it falling into the hands of the rebels during the late war and being used by them. The reports have only been recently made and there seems to be a considerable uniformity on the part of the committee in reporting these cases; but I do not desire to have this bill taken from the docket until all the cases are reported and we can determine whether we will test the principle. I ask that this be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to passing the bill over without prejudice? The Chair hears none. It will be so passed over.

JOHN ARMFIELD.

The bill (S. 491) for the relief of John W. Franklin, executor of the last will of John Armfield, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to John W. Franklin, executor of the estate of John Armfield, late of the county of Grundy, Tennessee, of $18,000.21, being the proceeds of $30,000.36 in legal money taken from the Bank of Louisiana, at New Orleans, La., by Capt. J. W. McClure, assistant quartermaster, under military order numbered 202, and by him turned over to Col. S. B. Holabird, chief quartermaster of that department, and by him disbursed.

Mr. CONGER. If there is a report in that case let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. JACKSON January 16:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 491) for the relief of John W. Franklin, executor of the last will of John Armfield, deceased, have considered the same, and respectfully submit the following report:

This claim, under a bill similar in all respects to the present, was before the committee for consideration at the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress, was then fully investigated, and a favorable report made thereon.

Upon a re-examination of the claim your committee have reached the same favorable conclusion, and as the facts and conclusions of law are fully set forth in their former report, it is again adopted as the report of your committee in the premises, as follows:

Mr. Jackson, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following report to accompany bill S. 2213.

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2213) for the relief of John W. Franklin, executor of the last will of John Armfield, deceased, make the following report:

That at the commencement and during the continuance of the late war John Armfield, a citizen and resident of Grundy County, Tennessee, was an inform old man, who remained quietly at home during the war; that he gave no aid, comfort, or encouragement to the rebellion or to persons engaged therein, but throughout the war remained loyal to the Government of the United States. He was a depositor in the Bank of Louisiana, at New Orleans, and in August, 1863, there was to his credit in said bank the sum of $30,000 in the notes or issues of the bank, and $1,239.65 in confederate treasury notes, arising from collections made for his account before the occupation of the city of New Orleans by the Federal military forces.

On the 17th of August, 1863, Major-General Banks, then in command of the Department of the Gulf, issued order No. 202, requiring the several banks and banking associations of New Orleans to pay over without delay to the chief quartermaster of the Army, or to such officers of his department as he might designate, all money in their possession belonging to or standing upon their books to the credit of any person registered as an enemy of the United States or engaged in any manner in the military, naval, or civil service of the "so-called confederate states, or who should have been or might thereafter be convicted of rendering any aid or comfort to the enemies of the United States." The order declared that all such funds would "be held and accounted for by the Quartermaster's Department, subject to the future adjudication of the Government of the United States." Under and in obedience to this order the Bank of Louisiana, in September, 1863, paid over to Capt. J. W. McClure, assistant quartermaster (the officer designated by the Quartermaster's Department to receive the same), the money or funds standing upon its books to the credit of John Armfield. The funds thus turned over by the bank consisted of $30,000 of its own notes or issues and $1,239.65 in confederate currency. Shortly after the receipt of the money, the chief quartermaster, Colonel Holabird, sold the notes of the bank at 60 per cent., receiving the sum of $18,000. It does not appear what disposition was made of the confederate currency. In 1866 said Armfield made application to the Secretary of War for the restoration of this $18,000, the proceeds of his funds. By order of the Secretary of War, dated the 20th of November, 1866, the claim and papers relating thereto were referred to the Quartermaster-General for action required for reimbursement of claimant. The Quartermaster-General, on the 28th November, 1866, referred the matter for examination and settlement to the Third Auditor of the Treasury Department, who, on the 14th December, 1867, made his report to the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, setting forth the facts of the case and his reasons for rejecting the claim, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Third Auditor's Office, December 14, 1867.

SIR: I herewith submit for your consideration a claim of John Armfield to be reimbursed certain moneys seized at New Orleans, La., by the military officers of the United States. It appears that there was to the credit of this claimant in the Bank of Louisiana, at New Orleans, La., $30,000.36 in the notes of said bank and $1,239.65 in confederate notes, the proceeds of collection by said bank for claimant; that orders were issued by the military authorities of the United States in that department for the seizure of property in the possession of disloyal persons, &c.; that in pursuance of these orders this bank, on the 8th and 11th of September, 1863, paid over this money (in kind, as above stated) to Capt. J. W. McClure, assistant quartermaster; that he soon afterward turned over this money to Col. S. B. Holabird, chief quartermaster of that department; that Colonel Holabird sold the notes of the Bank of Louisiana at 60 per cent., realizing the sum of $18,000.21. The disposition made of the confederate notes is not shown, but as they had no legal value the question is immaterial.

In view of the recommendations made in this report, a detailed statement of the testimony is deemed unnecessary, but a general examination of it is believed to disclose the following facts, viz: That claimant had been a resident of Tennessee for some years next preceding the rebellion, and continued so to be during the war; that he remained in Tennessee during the entire war; that he was an aged and infirm man, and was for that reason unable to participate actively in the war either for or against the United States; that he never gave any assistance to the rebel enemies further than he was obliged to do by the actual presence of armed rebels, and that he took the amnesty oath prescribed by the proclamation of the President, dated December 8, 1863, as soon as the state of his health would permit him to go to the headquarters of the Federal forces after their arrival in his neighborhood. As this seizure appears to have been substantially an appropriation of personal property at New Orleans, La., in September, 1863, the claim therefore appears to have originated during the war of the rebellion, and in a State which had enacted an ordinance of secession, and which had been declared by the proclamation of the President of July 1, 1862, to be in insurrection. It would therefore appear that any settlement of this claim is inhibited by the act of February 9 (or 19), 1867, which construed the act of July 4, 1864. But if it be decided that the settlement of this claim is not inhibited by that act, then there appear to be other reasons why no settlement can be made by this Department: 1st, no general appropriation or provision of any kind for refunding of moneys seized in the manner in which this money was taken has ever been made by Congress; and, 2d, it can not be ascertained what appropriation had the benefit of the expenditure of any part of claimant's money, and therefore no particular appropriations can be designated as properly charged with the duty of refunding. (After discussing these points the report concludes:) It is therefore submitted, first, that settlement of this claim is inhibited by the act of Congress of February 9 (or 19), 1867, which construed the act of Congress of July 4, 1864; and, second, that the jurisdiction of this office does not extend to the settlement of this claim, because no fund has ever been appropriated and no provision of any kind ever made by Congress for the settlement of claims of this character. It is therefore recommended that the claim be disallowed.

Respectfully submitted.

Hon. JOHN M. BRODHEAD,
Second Comptroller.

The Second Comptroller, under date of March 8, 1868, gave a written opinion in the case, concurring with the Auditor in the conclusions stated by him, and suggesting that "the remedy of claimant lies elsewhere than at the Treasury. His application should be made to Congress or the Court of Claims."

John Armfield some time after this died, and John W. Franklin, the duly appointed and qualified executor of his will, seeks by the present bill to have Congress return or repay to him, for the benefit of said Armfield's estate, without interest, said sum of $18,000, which the United States Government received and appropriated as aforesaid. The single question presented in the case is, whether there is now any legal obligation or equitable duty on the part of the Government to make such restitution. No judicial proceedings were ever instituted by or on behalf of the United States to confiscate or condemn either the funds of Armfield received from the Bank of Louisiana or the proceeds thereof. The object and purpose of said military order No. 202, under which Armfield's deposit was taken possession of by the military authorities, was not to supply military wants and necessities, but simply to impound and confiscate the moneys of public enemies. By reason of his residence in Tennessee, John Armfield occupied (till December, 1863) constructively the relation of enemy, but was in fact loyal to the Government. He did not, therefore, fall within either the letter or the spirit and intent of the order; neither were his funds subject to lawful seizure and confiscation under the confiscation acts of Congress. But assuming that his technical enemy relation by residence in a rebellious State would have authorized the confiscation of his funds on deposit in New Orleans, the question is presented whether the commanding general of the department could, by military order, enforce such confiscation.

This is not an open question. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Planters' Bank vs. Union Bank (16 Wallace, pages 494 to 497), had occasion to pass upon the validity of order No. 202; and it was there decided that General Banks had no authority to make said order, and that it was wholly invalid and worked no divestiture of the owner's right and title to the funds seized thereunder. The following extract from the opinion of the court will show the reasoning and principle on which its decision was rested:

"The validity of the order (No. 202) is, therefore, the first thing to be considered. It was made on the 17th August, 1863. Then the city of New Orleans was in quiet possession of the United States forces. It had been captured more than fifteen months before that time, and undisturbed possession was maintained ever after its capture. Hence, the order was no attempt to seize property 'flagrante bello,' nor was it a seizure for immediate use of the Army. It was simply an attempt to confiscate private property, which, though it may be subjected to confiscation by legislative authority, is, according to the modern law of nations, exempt from capture as booty of war. Still, as the war had not ceased, though it was not flagrant in the district, and as General Banks was in command of the district, it must be conceded that he had power to do all that the laws of war permitted, except so far as he was restrained by the pledged faith of the Government or by the effect of Congressional legislation. A pledge, however, had been given that rights of property should be respected. When the city was surrendered to the army under General Butler, a proclamation was issued, dated May 1, 1862, one clause of which was as follows: 'All the rights of property of whatever kind will be held inviolate, subject only to the laws of the United States.' This, as was remarked in the case of the Venice, only reiterated the rules established by the legislative and executive action of the National Government in respect to the portions of the States in insurrection occupied and controlled by the troops of the Union. That action, it was said, indicated the policy of the Government to be not to regard districts occupied and controlled by national troops as in actual insurrection, or their inhabitants as subject, in most respects, to treatment as enemies.

"Substantial, complete, and permanent military occupation and control was held to draw after it the full measure of protection to persons and property consistent with a necessary subjection to military government. We do not assert that anything in General Butler's proclamation exempted property within the occupied district from liability to confiscation as enemies' property, if in truth it was such. All that is now said is, that after that proclamation private property in the district was not subject to military seizure as booty of war. But admitting as we do that private property remained subject to confiscation, it is undeniable that confiscation was possible only to the extent and in the manner provided by the acts of Congress. Those acts were passed on the 6th August, 1861, and on the 17th July, 1862. No others authorized the confiscation of private property, and they provided the manner in which alone confiscation could be made. They designated Government agents for seizing enemies' property, and they directed the mode of procedure for its condemnation in the courts. The system devised was necessarily exclusive. No authority was given to a military commander, as such, to effect any confiscation. * * * It is therefore of little importance to inquire what, under the general laws of war, are the rights of a conqueror, for during the recent civil war the Government of the United States asserted no general rights in virtue of conquest to compel the payment of private debts to itself. On the contrary, it was impliedly disclaimed except so so far as the acts of 1861 and 1862 asserted it. These enactments declaring that private property belonging to certain classes of persons might be confiscated, in the manner particularly described, are themselves expressive of an intent that the rights of conquest should not be exercised against private property except in the cases mentioned and in the manner pointed out. * * * It follows, then, that the order of General Banks was one which he had no authority to make, and that his direction to the bank to pay to the quartermaster of the Army the debt (or deposit) due to the Planters' Bank was wholly invalid."

The Supreme Court having thus declared that the attempt of the commanding general to enforce by military order the confiscation acts of Congress against the property and effects of even actual enemies of the United States was without authority and invalid, and it further appearing that there has never been any judicial procedure for the condemnation of the funds seized, as directed and required by the confiscation acts of 1861 and 1862, so as to divest and defeat the private rights of the owner, it follows that the United States never acquired any valid interest or title to the money of Armfield turned over to the Government under said order 202. Under an invalid and unauthorized order of its commanding general the Government simply got possession of the fund, and placed itself in position to enforce against it the confiscation acts of 1861 and 1862, provided the owner had subjected himself to the penalties of said acts by aiding and abetting the rebellion. But Armfield was actually loyal, and his money could not lawfully have been condemned and confiscated under said acts.

At the close of the war Mr. Armfield was an old man, completely broken up by the casualties and disasters of war. He was in feeble and infirm health; moved about with difficulty and with pain to himself. He lived in a remote section of the State, and for years after the close of the war he diligently prosecuted his claim before the Departments of the Government, which at that time were supposed to have the proper authority, if not the sole jurisdiction, to adjust and settle the matter. After the disallowance of his claim by the Treasury Department, on the grounds already stated, which did not go to the merits of the claim, he departed this life before he had time or opportunity to apply elsewhere for relief.

It is suggested, in the opinion of the Third Auditor of the Treasury (above quoted), that the claimant's remedy was either in the Court of Claims or to Congress. If the military authorities had seized the funds under the act of Congress of March 12, 1863, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States," the claimant could have resorted to the Court of Claims within the time prescribed by law for relief. The claim does not, however, fall within the provisions of, or originate under, that act. But, as stated by the Supreme Court in the case cited, the order under which the funds were taken possession of was an unauthorized attempt by the military commander to enforce summarily the confiscation acts of 1861 and 1862.

In the opinion of your committee no jurisdiction was conferred upon the Court of Claims to grant relief in such cases, and the claimant has been guilty of no laches in failing to seek redress in that direction. The claim being a just and meritorious one, the Government should not refuse relief.

Your committee, therefore, consider that the money belonging to said Armfield to the amount of $18,000, received in par funds and appropriated as aforesaid by the Government, should be restored to his estate, but without interest; and they accordingly report back the bill with a recommendation that it be passed by the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. I am well aware of the carefulness with which the Committee on Claims examines all these cases and the fairness with which those who make reports from it consider all the circumstances arising in them, and so I hesitate a good deal about opposing the passage of this bill. I am free to say, having been a member of the Committee on Claims at the last Congress, that the careful manner in which claims are examined and the legal questions are considered, and especially by the gentleman who made this report, impresses me very much; and if this case was not an old acquaintance of mine I should not interpose. I had occasion in the other House to examine this claim. It has an old, familiar look, and I notice now in the report it requires a very long, careful argument to find grounds upon which its payment can be recommended. The claim has been made in the Senate heretofore, and still I think it never succeeded until last year in having a favorable report.

There are two or three things in regard to this claim that I think Senators should look at before it is passed, thereby establishing a precedent, part of which appears in this record and part of which may be my own recollection.

There is no assumption in the report, to begin with, that this claimant was a loyal citizen of the United States; it is not pretended that he comes within that category at all. On the contrary, it is admitted that he was to all intents and purposes within the meaning of the law an enemy, at least that he did hostile acts and was in a hostile attitude to the Government. It is excused in the report by saying that he did no more in opposition to his Government than he was compelled to do. The kind of compulsion or the amount of hostility which he manifested to the Government is not set forth at all, but it is smoothed over by that general proposition that he did no more against his Government in a hostile way than he was compelled to do. To a certain extent that rule would apply to a great many men who were in actual hostility to this Government. It has now become a matter of history and a matter of knowledge that there was more or less compulsion upon individuals, making them take a hostile attitude against the Government. In reply to that I submit that during the time this claimant was depositing his good money in a bank in New Orleans, far removed from his residence, and while he was depositing confederate money there, while he was giving all the benefit of his business transactions to banks and to a region of the country in possession of the enemy, it would have been nearer and easier—for Tennessee was a large portion of the time during the war in the possession of the Army of the United States—for him to have deposited his money and conducted his transactions in loyal States and for the benefit of his Government.

I do not hear anything and I do not remember anything in this particular case which takes it out of the class of other cases except the age and infirmity of this old man; and his age and infirmity is made the excuse for his having been dragged into opposition to his Government, and the pretense is, and the only pretense is, that from his age and from his condition of health he was unfit to be an active enemy and engage in active hostilities against the Government.

This is a case that appeals somewhat to our kindly feeling because of the age and infirmity of the original claimant and because of the loss and injury which the losing of this money brought upon him and upon his family; and if that were all there was in the case I would not rise in my place to make any objection to the passage of the bill; but in view of the vast amount of money involved in the thousands and thousands of claims and the millions of dollars still unsettled and undecided coming under the head of "war claims" I think the Senate should be very careful not to establish a precedent which will be a guide to this committee in the future or to any other committee for stepping over the well-recognized boundaries of the present law and the present decisions of Congress. If we may pass over these boundaries from sympathy, if we may vote to pass a bill for one claimant on the ground of sympathy, we may pass another for another reason, and not be governed by any certain or definite rule.

In my examination of this case I found many things which tend to remove the main, leading objection to the passage of this bill in itself, and yet I never could see, as the committee seem to have seen now, on what principle I could recommend the passage of this bill, how according to the rules which the committees of both Houses have adopted in regard to the recommendation of bills for old war claims they could bring this within the principle, for to my mind unless there is something new shown since I did examine the claim it must be controlled alone by our sympathy for the condition of the man and a desire to do a kind-hearted, generous thing to this old Tennesseean, to do a clever thing to him. Unless it be on that ground, I see no reason why this bill ought to pass.

I do not know, I can not say but that later there has been some new testimony or some new light, but I think the report is taken from a report made over two years ago, and that report of the facts as they were then has been adopted by this committee, and there is no pretense that any new testimony or any new evidence has been discovered to take this case out of the condition it was in at that time.

Mr. COCKRELL. To what report does the Senator refer?

Mr. CONGER. The report which was read here, the committee adopting a report which was made by the Committee on Claims two years ago.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has there been any adverse report in either branch?

Mr. CONGER. That is not the point I was on. My point was that, unless there was some new evidence, some new testimony since I myself had examined the claim or since the committee had formerly examined it, I was unwilling without further examination to vote in favor of the passage of this bill.

It is with more than ordinary reluctance that I antagonize a report of this committee. To show my great confidence in the ability and integrity of the gentleman from Tennessee who made this report, I say that it is with reluctance I oppose the passage of a bill which he has recommended; but with my views that this does not come within the rule, that it has to be brought within the rule by argumentation rather than by facts, that it will violate the principles upon which Congress has acted in the passage of war claims, I can not support the bill, and I should like very much—for I can not on the mere reading of the report follow its arguments and statements clear through—to have the bill go over until I can myself re-examine it, and if I find I am in error, I shall certainly withdraw any objection and permit the bill to pass at any time, as far as my vote is concerned.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President——

Mr. GARLAND. Will the Senator from Tennessee holding the floor give way for a motion for an executive session?

Mr. HOAR. I should like to speak about two minutes or not more than five on this bill at some time, and as I am going away for a fortnight perhaps I had better do it now; but I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. JACKSON, I will yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand it, Mr. President, this bill is based upon a principle which has been applied both by Congress and by the Supreme Court whenever any case has arisen which called for its application, and it is this: The laws of war authorize a belligerent nation to carry its hostility to the extent of the entire destruction or confiscation of all enemies' property whatever. Strictly construed they also authorize the enslaving or slaying of every enemy whatever, with his wife and children, if need be, if the belligerent government see fit. But in modern times there have been great alleviations of the strictness of the ancient and barbarous rule, so that it is not customary for civilized nations while at war to destroy the private property of an enemy either by sea or land unless the property itself constitute a public danger so as to be part of the resources of the other belligerent. It is not customary on land to seize for confiscation of the government any of the belligerent's property except so much as comes within the class I have just referred to on the one side or may itself be made useful for the support of the army in the field coming under the class of quartermaster or military stores on the other.

The Supreme Court of the United States have held that the degree of severity with which the ancient belligerent right shall be enforced is a question for the political department of the Government, for Congress where it has legislated, or for the head of the Army in the absence of any such legislation; and therefore when enemy's property has been seized, not for the use of the Army as quartermaster or commissary stores, but has been taken possession of and kept by the Government, or sold and its proceeds kept, the amount has been uniformly restored to the party, either under quasi-judicial processes where Congress has established tribunals authorized to make the restoration or by act of Congress where that is necessary.

What is this case? It does not make any difference that the sufferer was an infirm old man and was not an actual belligerent, because the belligerent character was imputed to him conclusively by his being in the enemy's territory where some funds which he had in a bank were seized by an order which the Supreme Court of the United States passing on that general order of General Banks have held to be illegal, because, Congress having determined the policy not to make a general confiscation of enemies' property, the general in the field had no right to go beyond that policy. Therefore General Banks's order requiring the New Orleans banks to pay into the Treasury the private deposits of persons, whether enemies or friends, has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States to be illegal in the case from which the opinion is extracted in this report. That being so, this money is now in the Treasury. It has not been applied to the use of the United States except as all money that is covered into the Treasury may be supposed to have been; it was not quartermaster or commissary stores; and it is the duty of Congress to provide for its restoration. I am not aware since I have been here of a single case which depends on those principles where Congress has not adopted the view which this report adopts.

Mr. CONGER. May I inquire if this bank was not the depository of the confederate funds, and if this was not taken as a part of the funds generally, and the only means of knowing that it was a separate fund was that on the books of the bank it appeared there was so much to this man's credit?

Mr. HOAR. I am glad the Senator puts that question, because that illustrates precisely the care which the committee have taken in regard to this class of questions. We have had two or three cases, in one of which I made the report and in one of which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] made the report, where a depositor in that bank, the bank having been ordered to pay over his funds to the credit of the confederacy before we got possession of New Orleans, came in and asked us to reimburse him and restore the funds which had been captured. The reply was, "No, your deposit in bank had been turned over to the confederates in the beginning and we captured it as confederate funds; we can not go behind the present position of the confederate government as depositor in the bank and see whether they got that money by an illegal confiscation of some of their citizens' funds." And in those cases we have invariably declined relief. But the confederate government had several banks in which it made deposits, of which this was one. This bank had a large number of deposits, of which the deposit of the confederate treasurer was only one, and not a very large one in proportion to its whole line of deposits. This deposit was money deposited by this man in his private capacity.

Mr. CONGER. The reason I asked the question was that my recollection was that this very money, belonging to a citizen of Tennessee, had been so far seized by the confederate government, or at least that it was ordered to be——

Mr. HOAR. No, sir; it never had been.

Mr. JACKSON. The Senator will allow me to state that that is not the fact.

Mr. CONGER. I did not mean to say it had been seized in fact, but that by an order of the confederate government all money in bank had been ordered to be kept there for the use of the confederacy, whether it was private funds or public funds.

Mr. JACKSON. Oh, no.

Mr. HOAR. In all that class of cases we have denied relief.

Mr. GARLAND. Now, with the understanding that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] has the floor when this bill comes up again, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator withdraw that for a moment in order that I may ask a question, that the answer may go in the RECORD at this point?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT. I see it stated in this report that in the opinion of the committee no jurisdiction was conferred upon the Court of Claims to grant relief in such cases. Now, if the Government has money which has been covered into the Treasury which it can not legally hold, why is there not an implied contract on the part of the Government receiving that money to pay it back, and, therefore, why was there not jurisdiction in the Court of Claims?

Mr. HOAR. The Court of Claims, as I understand it, has never adopted that view of an implied contract, and the principle of law which authorizes the waiving a tort and bringing assumpsit on an implied contract to pay over money tortiously obtained does not obtain universally in our American States. It is denied in my own State of Massachusetts. But at any rate it never has been extended so far, and least of all it has never been adopted by the Court of Claims, that where a sum of money has been seized by an unlawful order of a military officer in time of war operating upon persons within his actual control and military jurisdiction and where the United States has received into its Treasury a sum of money exacted from a person under that condition of things, there was an implied contract to pay it which would authorize the party to sue in the Court of Claims. There is no such case to be found in that court that I ever heard of.

Mr. GARLAND. Now I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

Mr. PLATT submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

WILLIAM H. SMITH.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I sent it to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire into the cause of the removal of William H. Smith, colored, librarian of the House of Representatives. The committee is directed to reduce to writing the evidence which it takes in regard to this removal or supplanting of a faithful officer of this House, and lay the evidence, together with its report, before the House. The committee is further directed to report what change, if any, in the rules of the House is necessary to protect its employés against dismissal from their positions.

The SPEAKER. Upon what ground does the gentleman from Kentucky claim this to be a privileged question?

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not think it is a privileged question.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I claim that the resolution is privileged on the ground that it relates "to the convenience of members and the comfort of employés of the House." On page 360 of the Digest the Chair will find that such a resolution is a privileged question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has asked the gentleman from Kentucky to state the grounds on which he claims this is a privileged resolution.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I call the attention of the Chair to the following paragraph of page 360 of the Digest:

A resolution relating to the convenience of members and the comfort of employés of the House is a "privileged question."—Journal 1, 47, p. 1469.

I call the attention of the Chair also to Rule IX, which provides:

Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings.

This gentleman has been an officer of this House for a number of years, and has performed his duties with marked and rare ability. I think it is important that we should know whether this has been done to improve the civil service or whether it has been done to give his place to somebody else.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think this resolution comes within any definition of a privileged matter given in the rules or in the general parliamentary law of the country. The Chair decides it is not a privileged matter.

Mr. THOMPSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if Mr. Smith instigated this movement or not.

The SPEAKER. The matter is not before the House.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to say that Mr. Smith was never an employé of the House except in the capacity in which he is now employed. He has not been removed from that position.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I rise to a question of order. If the question is to be discussed let us discuss it on both sides.

GREELY RELIEF EXPEDITION.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask permission to again take up the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the House joint resolution No. 119, making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions. There seems to have been some informality in regard to the matter, for which perhaps I myself am in fault. Although the bill was actually in the Senate, sent there as I supposed correctly, there seems to have been some informality in the matter. I therefore move that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and that information of the action of the House be transmitted to the Senate.

The SPEAKER. It appears that when the matter was up before there was no order made by the House to further insist upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and at the other end of the Capitol that was construed to mean that the bill still remained with the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I waive all that point, assuming that I am responsible for the mistake that occurred.

The SPEAKER. It may have been an oversight of the Chair or of the House that the usual order was not made.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to consider the conference report, and further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS BY THE OHIO OVERFLOW.

Mr. FOLLETT. I ask unanimous consent to report at this time from the Committee on Appropriations a joint resolution for the relief of the sufferers by the flood in the Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The report of the Committee on Appropriations was read, as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution of the House 154, making an appropriation to relieve the sufferers by the overflow of the Ohio River and its tributaries, report the accompanying joint resolution as a substitute therefor, and recommend its immediate passage by the House.

The substitute joint resolution was read, as follows:

A joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue rations for the relief of destitute persons in the district overflowed by the Ohio River and its tributaries, and making an appropriation to relieve the sufferers by said overflow.

Resolved, &c., That the sum of $300,000 is hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended by and under the direction of the Secretary of War in the purchase and distribution of subsistence stores, clothing, and other necessary articles to such destitute persons as may require assistance in the district overflowed by the Ohio River and its tributaries by the recent flood; and he is authorized to co-operate with the several States and cities of which said district is a part in making distribution of the same. And the Secretary of War is also authorized in his discretion to use the hospital and other tents now possessed by the War Department so far as may be necessary to furnish temporary shelter to the destitute people who have been driven from their homes by said overflow, and he is authorized to use the steamboats and other boats and vessels belonging to and now employed by the Government upon the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers and their tributaries in the transportation and distribution of the supplies furnished by the United States or individuals to and among said destitute and suffering people; and he may employ such other means of transportation as he may deem necessary to carry the purposes of this resolution into effect.

Mr. HISCOCK. I would like to hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] state to the House the neighborhoods in which this money is to be expended, and what information he may possess upon the subject. And more than that, since the question is constantly obtruded before the House, I would like him to state what warrant in the Constitution the other side of the House finds for this appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The first question to be disposed of is the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] for unanimous consent that this joint resolution be now considered. Is there objection?

Mr. CHACE. Can not the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] express his views, the right to object being reserved?

The SPEAKER. That may be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HISCOCK. The right to object, as I understand, is reserved.

Mr. BAYNE. There ought not to be any objection.

Mr. KEIFER. I think we ought not to take up time in debating this proposition if we are not to consider it for final action.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution, the question being on the substitute reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. FOLLETT. I ask that this matter be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KEIFER. Consent for that is already granted.

The SPEAKER. That is the effect of the granting of unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. FOLLETT. I will state very briefly, Mr. Speaker, the reasons for this appropriation. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] desires to know whether there is any warrant in the Constitution for such an appropriation. Necessity knows neither law nor constitution, and never did in this country. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] There are precedents of this House and of Congress for exactly such appropriations. The precedent was set in the last Congress by an appropriation for the relief of the sufferers along the Mississippi River. There has never been in the history of this country such a flood as that which is now raging upon the Ohio River. Families by thousands are driven from their homes, and are to-day camping out in open fields with nothing to protect them except simply such clothing as they could save from the wrecks of their houses. The cities and towns along the line of the Ohio River and most of its tributaries are now under water. I have just received a dispatch from the city of Cincinnati, which I desire to read, coming, as it does, from the president of one of our banks and one of the leading business men of the city:

Do all you can to get appropriation for flood sufferers. Water still rising fast, and there will be great loss and distress.

Thousands of families along the Ohio River are now houseless and homeless. Thousands of families are dependent entirely upon charity—charity of neighbors situated in great measure exactly as they are, driven from their homes, and having no means to furnish subsistence and support to these sufferers.

Mr. HISCOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether any application has been made by the Legislature of Ohio for this relief from Congress, and whether the State, through its Legislature, has made any appropriation for the purpose?

Mr. FOLLETT. The State of Ohio, as I am informed, has made an appropriation. The Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati has made an appropriation; and I can say to the gentleman that so far as Cincinnati is concerned, I think she will take care of her people. But Cincinnati is not the only place that is overwhelmed by this misfortune. A town but fifteen miles above that city is entirely under water; there is not a house from which subsistence can be furnished to the sufferers. There is no means by which it can be afforded, except by outside aid. A town just below Cincinnati—the town of Lawrenceburg—is also entirely under water, and there is nobody there so situated as to render relief.

I can say to the gentleman and to this House that the State which I have the honor in part to represent here never turned a deaf ear to the voice of suffering. When the cry came one year ago from across the waters—from Germany—that her people were suffering in consequence of floods, our people sent them assistance, not by thousands simply but by the fifty thousands of dollars.

Congress is now asked to furnish temporary relief to these people who have become involved in a calamity unprecedented since this country was first settled. It is true that one year ago we had in this country a calamity of a similar character, but not of like extent with this. At that time the State of Ohio made its contributions for the aid of the sufferers. The Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati and every moneyed institution of the place not only contributed, but organized their charity in such a way that it was distributed so as most effectually to relieve the suffering. And to-day the only subsistence these sufferers have is such as is furnished by these charitable and good-hearted people.

Mr. Speaker, under such circumstances this is not a question of what the letter of the Constitution or the letter of the law may be. The cry of distress comes up for relief which can be furnished, and it is the duty of Congress when such relief is in its power to furnish it.

Mr. Speaker, the people involved in this calamity number hundreds of thousands. It is spreading along the Ohio River and will reach its mouth. Every tributary of that river has had a flood of water unknown in history. At Wheeling, where it is now falling, it was nine feet higher than ever before known since the country was settled.

These people, as I said before, are now houseless and homeless. You ask they shall be relieved by their immediate neighbors. Those neighbors are granting relief to the greatest extent in their power. But shall the great Government of the United States, with its Treasury overflowing with a surplus there that can be appropriated, sit idly by when our citizens are suffering, our people are starving, and to-day without shelter from the storms still pitilessly beating upon their heads? [Applause.]

I wish to call attention now to the fact we are to-day in controversy with the Senate simply on a matter of detail to grant relief to an expedition which was sent out and stationed near the North Pole, the Greely relief expedition. We do it because our people are there suffering and need relief. We make this appropriation in thousands and not hundreds of thousands because a few of our people are now where they can not get relief except it be as we furnish it to them.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose I shall have the hardihood——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield the floor to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FOLLETT. Yes; I yield the floor to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. After he has concluded I desire to be heard for a few minutes.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose I shall have the hardihood to vote against this resolution, but I have been in the hope of seeing the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] in his seat, and I do not see my colleague from New York [Mr. COX] in his seat. I was in hope, I say, of seeing those gentlemen here, as they are always asking us for constitutional grounds upon which to base our appropriations; I had expected, sir, that those gentlemen would be here to call the attention of the House to the fact there may be a violent assault upon the Constitution of the United States by the passage of this joint resolution, rather than to have that duty left to be discharged by me. And, having given this hint, having called the attention of those gentlemen to that fact, I have no doubt they will have a word or two to say on that precise question. [Laughter and applause.]

It has been said, however, there is precedent for this action to be found in what was done at the last Congress. It is true, sir, that in the last Congress they came here from States bordering on the Mississippi River, and told us of the freedmen, the wards of the nations, and appealed to us to make the appropriation which was then asked for. And without a moment's hesitation we did make that appropriation. And I have the right to say here that on that occasion, when we were making those appropriations—and I do not make this remark as questioning the motive of the gentleman from Ohio—it did seem as if there were to result on the part of members on the other side of the House from the banks of the Mississippi who appeared before the Committee on Appropriations of this House asking for those appropriations—I say it looked much more as if there were politics in it than provision for the support of those people who were being overflowed by the rising waters of the Mississippi River. But I say here now, on information which did come to the Committee on Appropriations, absolute injury was being done to those people by the excessive appropriations which were then made.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while it may be against the sentiment of both sides of this House, because it may be construed I am opposing the passage of this resolution, nevertheless I am compelled to say in this connection I had hoped no great State like Ohio, an empire, would come here when her Legislature is in session and ask to have her citizens supported and succored from the Federal Treasury.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR rose.

Mr. HISCOCK. Whether it is in sympathy with this side of the House or not——

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I desire to say——

Mr. FOLLETT rose.

Mr. HISCOCK. I say if my State of New York were here, I would stand on this floor and ask this House not to give it to her.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HISCOCK. I remember the State of Illinois came knocking at the door of the Treasury for assistance, and if there ever was an occasion when I admired my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who was with me on the Committee on Appropriations, it was when he shrugged his shoulders at his State for making that application. Where States are poor, where there is a large indigent population, we will say, like the negroes, who are the wards of the nation, you may come here and ask to have them succored and supported; but for Ohio, New York, Illinois, Michigan even, to pass around the hat of beggary, sir, I do not admire the spirit in either of those States which would permit it. And so far as my State is concerned, they would rally in their cities, rally in their churches—I believe they would prefer to do it for Ohio even than to have a Representative of that State stand here on this floor and advocate it to be taken out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes; I will yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman proceeds, the Chair desires to inquire whether the gentleman from Ohio yielded the floor to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FOLLETT. I yielded part of my time to the gentleman from New York, but I do not object to the gentleman from Pennsylvania having the floor for a brief time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. JOHNSON, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. 19) providing for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

FLOODS IN OHIO RIVER.

Mr. HISCOCK. My only desire to reserve any time, Mr. Speaker, in this discussion is because of the fact that several gentlemen around me have asked a part of such time as I may have at my disposal. I yield now five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. As I understand it, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] simply yielded to the gentleman from New York a portion of his own time. If that is the fact, then I wish to ask if the gentleman from Ohio does retain the floor, and whether the gentleman from New York can yield to any one else?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood at first; but the Chair subsequently understood the gentleman from Ohio to acquiesce in what the gentleman from New York had done as to disposing of the time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I did not so understand the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. REED. The fact of the matter is that the gentleman from Ohio did yield the floor. Subsequently, after the gentleman from New York had begun to speak, the gentleman from Illinois asked the gentleman from Ohio the question whether he intended to yield the floor or not, and the result of the conversation was that the gentleman from Ohio did yield the floor.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Maine does not know anything of the result of the conversation between the gentleman from Ohio and myself.

Mr. REED. Only in so far as it was heard by the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman entirely misunderstood what took place.

Now, what I desire to know, and all I wish to know, is whether the gentleman from Ohio loses the floor and all of the time to which he is entitled?

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman from New York addressed the House the Chair was uncertain as to whether the gentleman from Ohio had yielded the floor absolutely or whether he had merely yielded a part of his time to the gentleman from New York. The Chair understood the response of the gentleman from Ohio, in answer to a question, to be an acquiescence in what had been done by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But as I understand now the gentleman from Ohio states that he had not yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Ohio acquiesced in the arrangement of the gentleman from New York in regard to the time yielded by the gentleman from New York to the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Illlinois, as the Chair understands.

Mr. HISCOCK. There will be no difficulty in reference to the division of time between the gentleman from Ohio and myself. There are two or three gentlemen who wish to be heard on this side.

Mr. FOLLETT. I wish to say in reference to this matter that all I desire to do is if there are arguments to be made against this resolution to reserve some part of the time to which I am entitled upon our side for a reply.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I understand the gentleman from Ohio does not yield all his time?

Mr. HISCOCK. Now I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Ohio to acquiesce in that arrangement.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But he says he wishes to reserve a part of his time. Does the time yielded now to the gentleman from Illinois come out of his time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the time yielded by the gentleman from New York to come out of the time of the gentleman from Ohio under the present arrangement.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then he will not have any time left.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to know how much the gentleman from Ohio was entitled to.

The SPEAKER. To one hour.

Mr. BLOUNT. If that is to be consumed by gentlemen upon the other side, then there will be no time left to him, as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can control the time as he pleases.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suppose if the gentleman should desire an hour, and an hour is desired on this side, there will be no difficulty about arranging the time.

Mr. FOLLETT. I am content that that side of the House should have one hour—those who are opposed to this measure—and give us an hour on this side, or rather an hour to those who are in favor of it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have no idea that we will occupy as much as an hour.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. All I desire is that the gentleman from Ohio shall not lose all of his time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has the right to control that himself, and the Chair is simply carrying out what the Chair believes to be the agreement made with the approbation of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to say to the gentleman from Ohio that I suppose most of the time that I shall yield to gentlemen on this side will be consumed in favor of the resolution.

I yield now to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the Committee on Appropriations that reported this bill or joint resolution to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, and so far as I know that committee, without regard to party, was unanimous in this recommendation.

I would have been content to have let the matter pass without a word on my part were it not for a remark of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], which might perhaps have placed me unwittingly, so far as my friend from New York is concerned I know, in a false light on this question.

We have been familiar with similar questions during the last Congress, and I think also during some Congresses prior to that. Appropriations similar to this have been made. The gentleman from New York, at that time the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and my colleague on that committee, does state correctly that when the proposition was made to expend a portion of the money of the United States for the relief of the State of Illinois I was anxious that that expenditure should be guarded. I did not want citizens of Illinois, nor do I want them now, to be relieved except as they may have needed immediate relief because of the necessities that were pressing upon them on account of a great emergency. The Legislature of the State was at that time in session, and the great State of Illinois was equal to the task of relieving her citizens, as she appropriated $250,000 from her treasury, if I am correct in my recollection, for the relief of people injured by that overflow. But at that time some citizens along the Ohio and the Mississippi Rivers did receive temporary relief under the action of Congress by the issuing of rations, and perhaps in some instances clothing, before the relief could be given by the State.

Now, I apprehend, without being troubled by the constitutional question so far as I am concerned, that when the waters of this country descend almost for forty days and forty nights, and men and women and children are driven by multiplied thousands from their homes and are without shelter and starving, I am ready to give them relief by appropriations from the Federal Treasury temporarily or until their States can act. And then I am frank to say that I want to see the great States, especially of the North, with their wealth and intelligence and liberality, come to the rescue and protect their citizens that are in want out of their own treasures and by their own means; and subject to this emergency I believe these States are ready and willing, including my own, to do that thing.

Mr. HISCOCK. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE].

Mr. BAYNE. It seems to me there is no constitutional difficulty in the way of this appropriation. I think that the clause of the Constitution which authorizes the Congress of the United States "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States" includes the right to make this appropriation. If any great calamity shall befall any section of this country such as has befallen the people along the Ohio River and its tributaries, I have not a doubt in my mind about the constitutional power of Congress to make an appropriation from those taxes to meet that emergency and to provide for the welfare of those people.

On the same principle I am willing to justify the bill which was reported from the Committee on Agriculture to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among cattle. It is to provide for the general welfare. And that the power is in the Congress of the United States to make this appropriation, under a proper interpretation of the Constitution, I have not a particle of doubt.

Mr. Speaker, the district which I represent has been very largely a sufferer by this terrible calamity. There have been thousands and thousands of people driven from their homes by this great flood. A great many of them are now suffering and in want. Our people have raised voluntary contributions and our cities have made appropriations for the relief of these people. I am not prepared to say whether our citizens would take advantage of this appropriation; I am inclined to think our people would not; I believe they will adequately provide for the suffering that is being there endured by them.

But while I think that, I believe it is the bounden duty of every gentleman here to support this measure and to help these communities and localities which are unable to help themselves. There are certain places along the Ohio River which I know where the people are driven from their homes, and where it would be a burden that could not be endured by their neighbors and friends to raise the requisite amount of money or the requisite provisions for their comfort and safety during this time of suffering. Therefore I say we should make this appropriation. I say it should receive the hearty and unanimous concurrence of Congress, and that relief should be sent as soon as possible to these suffering people. And as to the constitutional difficulties, even if there were such, they should not stand in my way in making an appropriation. But, as I have said before, I believe there is no constitutional impediment in the way of this appropriation at all, and that we are perfectly justified in making it under the letter and in the spirit of the Constitution.

Mr. HISCOCK. How much more time have I?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand how much time the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] yielded to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. HISCOCK. I supposed I had an hour.

Mr. FOLLETT. I understood the gentleman from New York was to control an hour and that I was to control an hour.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from New York has forty-five minutes.

Mr. HISCOCK. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR].

Mr. HORR. I am in favor of this resolution, and the only question I have in my own mind is whether the amount is sufficient to meet the wants of the people that are now suffering. I am a little surprised at my friend from New York being troubled on this constitutional question.

Mr. HISCOCK. Do not misunderstand me. I am not troubled on it.

Mr. HORR. Not at all?

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, no; I want this remark inserted as a parenthesis in the speech of the gentleman from Michigan, that I am not troubled on this question.

Mr. HORR. Then I want to say——

Mr. EATON. The gentleman from New York was troubled on my account, not on his own.

Mr. HORR. Oh! he was troubled on your account?

Mr. EATON. And I wish to say I will take care of my own views without the gentleman's assistance.

Mr. HORR. I want to say that the gentleman's colleague from New York who is now facing me [Mr. COX], who has the most critical mind on constitutional questions in this House, will certainly agree with me that this bill comes within the pale of the Constitution, because he can not have forgotten that during, I think, the last session of Congress he carried around in his pocket a resolution to give to the starving Irish $300,000 under somewhat similar circumstances.

Mr. COX, of New York. I guess you are mistaken.

Mr. HORR. I believe I am not mistaken. And I leave it to the gentleman to say whether there is any reason in the Constitution why we should not do as much for a hungry American as for a hungry Irishman. [Laughter.] I recollect very well that that resolution was about being offered here week in and week out by the gentleman, without regard to constitutional difficulties.

Now, I had some question at that time about the constitutional power to give money to people living over the ocean. But I will say to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE], that after thinking of this matter a great deal I am firmly of the opinion that when there is any great calamity, like the one that is now visiting a portion of our common country, it is within its constitutional power for the Government of the United States to step in and give temporary help.

Let me beg of you to understand (and my friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] knows how that is) I have sometimes thought that in his argument as well as in the arguments of other men in the other end of the Capitol, where I heard him often, there seemed to be a notion in their minds that when this question of State rights comes up it is some foreign nation that is going to come in and take possession of their States. That is not so; it is our own flag; it is our own Government, not a foreign government. We are not going to send a foreign power to take charge of these folks down there and feed them and supply them. It is the American flag that is going there; they are going to be under the protection of the American Government. We are all of us a part of one great nation, and I do not feel as sensitive when I see my own Government officials around looking after the interest of this nation as I would be if a foreign nation was to be employed on this matter. You can see that distinction, my friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

There is a big difference between the American Government taking hold and trying to help out any portion of the American people and a foreign nation attempting to interfere with the rights of our States and citizens. This is a mistake that I have often fancied was made on the part of you gentlemen, and I want now to call attention to it.

These people are in immediate want; they need help. Starvation and want stare them in the face. We are right here and can act in a day if we see fit. We can send the means of relief right to the place where it will do some good. It is the whole American people helping some of their fellows in trouble. It is the same question which we had some time ago on the Mississippi; the same question we had with the yellow-fever trouble. This is the very question that must constantly arise.

My doctrine has always been that in construing the Constitution, where there is great good to be done, where there is a great calamity to be averted, to construe it liberally; but where the rights of citizens are at stake I would construe it strictly. I believe that in that view of the matter hardly any man here can vote against our sending relief to that entire valley which to-day is under water and its citizens fleeing in every direction for shelter and food. I do not believe there will be many "no" votes on this question.

We had just this question in my own State. The fires swept fifteen hundred families out of their homes. The people of the United States generously sent us several hundred thousand dollars. We raised, as my friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] said, in our churches and cities several hundred thousand more. We still lacked $265,000 of the necessary amount. Now, though there was no warrant for it in our constitution, yet every single member of our State Legislature voted to give the sufferers $265,000 to help them out of their trouble. There was not a man in the whole State of Michigan that I ever heard of who raised the constitutional question. A man could hardly have raised it and lived any longer in our State. [Laughter.] We believed that it was for a great and good object, and our legislators voted the amount.

Now, I believe this Congress will take the same view of the matter. We are all American citizens, and we are going to help some of the American people who are in sore trouble. That is all there is of it.

Do not forget that this is a government of the people, for the people, and this bill is simply the people as a whole saying that they will contribute of their money to relieve the wants of a few of their own citizens who are in great distress.

Let it always be understood that no State lines can stand in the way of such a charity.

I am for the bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. I now yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF].

Mr. GOFF. I take it for granted that there is not a member upon the floor of this House who is not entirely familiar with the fact that for the past week an unparalleled flood has devastated the great valley of the Ohio. Not even in the memorable flood of 1832 was such unparalleled disaster visited upon that people, nor has such disaster ever been visited upon the people in any other section of this country.

My friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] speaks as if the great State of Ohio should take care of this matter for herself. Sir, there are to-day a million of people suffering on the banks of that great stream. They are partly residents of the State of Pennsylvania, partly of the State of Ohio, partly of the State of West Virginia; and your own State of Kentucky, Mr. Speaker, has its shivering and starving thousands upon the banks of that stream.

In the face of this great calamity it is no time to split hairs on constitutional questions. If we have not the constitutional right to grant this relief, which I do not concede, then it may be based upon charity, as appealing to the finer instincts of humanity, in which the people of this country have never yet been found wanting. Basing it upon that, I say there should not be a dissenting vote in this House to-day on this question. It has grown to be a practice, it has become almost a custom, in the face of these great national calamities, for such appropriations as this to be made.

Let me say right here that on account of this fact private subscriptions and private donations have not poured in and will not pour in as they have in the past.

A word only, for my time is limited, as to the extent of this calamity. Commencing at the city of Pittsburgh and extending down the valley for over seven hundred miles we have to-day this unparalleled distress. At the city of Wheeling alone, a city of 38,000 population, there are at this very moment 10,000 of her citizens camped upon the hilltops above the city, without food and without shelter from this inclement weather. They are laboring men, men who work in furnaces, men who toil in glass-works, men who delve in the earth for ore, or who work at the forge. These men, who are dependent upon their daily labor, are not only without employment, but what makes it sadder beyond all computation is that the places at which they have labored will know them no more, because the flood has stolen in and put out their fires, destroyed their retorts, ruined their furnaces. It will be weeks or months before these men can resume labor and be able to earn their sustenance.

This condition of things is not confined to the city of Wheeling. I saw this morning a dispatch from the city of Bellaire, Ohio, where the same state of things exists. There is one village on the Ohio shore that has been entirely swept away. The city of New Mortonsville, in West Virginia, has lost forty-eight of its houses, which have floated off before the eyes of the people. They have been driven from their homes to the hilltops and from those hilltops they saw those homes swept away.

Mr. HISCOCK. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR].

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I had supposed that this resolution would be passed at once, unanimously, without any discussion on the part of anybody; but as it is to be discussed on the one side and the other, I will, in order to save time, appropriate the remarks of my friend from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], whose district is immediately opposite mine on the Ohio River, as a part of my speech, for the sake of brevity and also for the reason that he has made a most excellent address.

I do not think there is any necessity for discussing the constitutionality of this measure. I do not believe there is a single gentleman on this floor—I know there is none on this side, and I do not believe there is any one on the other side—who will hesitate a single moment because of any constitutional difficulty to cast his vote for this resolution.

I understand the remarks of the gentleman from New York; we all understand them. They are jocose, and jocose only; hence I will not waste a single moment of time in that discussion. I wish merely to say, in addition to what my friend from West Virginia has said, that at this time there is in my district, for fifty or sixty miles along the Ohio River, a great distress. Thousands and thousands of people—I have heard the number variously estimated; some gentlemen who profess to be very well advised say that there are to-day 200,000 people—men, women, and children—who have been completely driven from their homes and are gathered in groups on the hillsides and in remote parts of the country where the water has not yet reached.

Gentlemen have asked whether the great empire State of Ohio has made a request for relief of this kind. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that this calamity falls very heavily upon the upper and eastern part of our State, where we have no great charities organized such as there are in the city of Cincinnati and other localities. This district to which I have referred is for fifty miles occupied very largely with blasting furnaces, glass-works, coal-bakes, iron-mills, and nail-mills. Thousands of these people delve beneath the earth, and rarely see the sunlight except when leaving their homes in the morning or returning at the close of their day's labor. At the city of Bellaire and in that neighborhood thousands of buildings are now collected in great wrecks, and are being drifted down the Ohio River. School-houses and church buildings occupying ground high enough to be safe from the waters have been thrown open to shelter these people, who would otherwise be houseless. The distress is great, and if we have any generosity we should not waste time here upon this resolution, but pass it, and pass it at once, that it may go to the other end of the Capitol and be acted on there, so that the Secretary of War may promptly send relief to those people who at this very hour are cold and naked and hungry. It is a matter of imperative duty; and I trust that we shall not waste time in this discussion, but act at once. I wish only to add that $300,000 will be but a beginning. A million of dollars will not more than meet the immediate wants of those people along the Ohio River.

Mr. HISCOCK. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD].

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. STRUBLE. I would like to make the inquiry whether or not, in view of the statements which have been made on this floor with reference to this great emergency, we can not vote now upon this measure and listen to speeches afterward.

The SPEAKER. That is not a question for the Chair. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BELFORD. I have got the floor. [Laughter and applause.] Much as I deplore this great calamity, Mr. Speaker, which has made homeless hundreds of thousands of people, much as I regret human suffering in any shape or form, I can but felicitate the House on the fact we have now an opportunity to open the vaults of the national Treasury [laughter and applause] and relieve ourselves of a portion of the surplus revenue so diligently hoarded and so scrupulously kept by a Secretary of the Treasury from the State of New York. [Laughter and applause.]

Talk about Constitution! Talk about laws! Humanity is greater than any constitution which was ever formulated by any people. It is humanity for which constitutions are enacted and laws are made. And Paul put it right when he said the greatest of all the virtues is charity, either in the individual or the nation.

Talk about State rights in a matter in the cloudy presence of a constantly accumulating calamity! Suppose my friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] had lived in the days of Noah [laughter] and had found himself perched on the top of Mount Ararat looking down upon the submerged plains [renewed laughter], the people fleeing from Nineveh, some swimming, others drowning, and children lifting up their hands to him to render assistance; I suppose he would have referred that drowning crowd to the city council of Nineveh and told them to make an appropriation to stop the rain. [Laughter and applause.] That would have been State-rights doctrine then, and it is State-rights doctrine to-day.

I hold this is a nation, and a nation which is deeply interested in the welfare, happiness, and prosperity of every citizen who lives within its limits. Last year we had a flood along the borders of the Mississippi River. Congress generously appropriated money for that purpose, a Republican President signed the bill, a Republican Congress made the appropriation, and a Republican Secretary of War sent thousands of rations and thousands of tents to feed and shelter the people of the South who were suffering from that great flood. Here is a flood that has devastated, as has been remarked on the floor of this House, a region of country seven hundred miles in length. Indiana is interested; Ohio is concerned; Pennsylvania is affected; West Virginia is injured, so too is Kentucky. Now, in the name of Heaven—not in the name of the Constitution, but in the name of that sweet broad rainbow-robed charity which would make us better and brighter and more generous men—let us make this appropriation. [Applause.]

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, having in the last Congress reported to this House the joint resolutions which were passed by Congress appropriating money to be expended in that way, I do not believe any one will think I am troubled with constitutional scruples in that respect, for I certainly am not. But nevertheless, while I shall not oppose the resolution, I would be in favor of appropriations of this sort being confined to States which hardly seem to have the wealth or which seem not to be in condition to be able to expend money for the support of their citizens.

But, sir, I have gained by this discussion all I expected. I desired to call attention to the Constitution and to hear from the other side on that question; and I am in the hope they will find constitutional ground upon which to base this appropriation.

We have had up before the House a bill for the purpose of giving such control as would secure the eradication of the cattle-plague. It is a bill—and what I say here now on that subject I may not have the opportunity to say hereafter—it is a measure in which the people of the great Northwest, certainly the people of my State, feel a deep interest.

But the moment it is introduced here the venerable men on the other side jump to their feet and shout, "The Constitution is in danger!" I remember, Mr. Speaker, a few years ago, when the people of the South came here and asked to have a quarantine law passed for the protection of their section against the yellow fever. Gentlemen on the other side then contented themselves with making speeches against the bill on constitutional grounds. They announced that there was no provision in the Constitution which would allow anything of that kind. But I noticed that when it came to the question of the vote upon it there was not a single gentleman upon the other side of the House who voted "no." There was not a division even upon the bill. It was passed by unanimous consent. Now, I am in favor of the passage of resolutions of this kind in the interest of humanity. But I am in favor also of finding a liberal interpretation of the Constitution for measures of this kind and for all measures which affect and promote good government and prosperity among the people of this country.

I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I suppose that there will be no division on this question when we come to vote. But it is well enough for us to understand the scope of this resolution, especially that gentlemen upon the other side of the House should consider and understand it. We will be called upon before this session closes to vote an appropriation of a precisely similar character. I do not mean for sufferers on other tributaries of the Mississippi, but we will be called upon to vote, for instance, on a bill to give millions of money to educate the illiterate people of this country; and will be asked by gentlemen on the other side for appropriations for just such matters as this, though perhaps in a different shape. I can almost hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Indiana now raising the constitutional question when such requests come up. We will be called upon by the River and Harbor Committee to vote money to improve the navigation of streams which it must be candidly admitted—I am satisfied when the question is asked of gentlemen upon the other side, "Where is any evidence that these streams are navigable?"—have not water enough in them to float a canal-boat. We will be called upon to appropriate perhaps a half million of money or more to the sufferers along the Mississippi River, who, notwithstanding the fact that they live in a region which has had the benefit of governmental supervision for years, and on a river whose banks have been raised, where the débris has been removed, and where the channel has been swept by Government appropriations, will come asking us for relief, telling us that the river is in some places twenty or fifty or seventy-five miles in width and the people are gathered together on the banks.

If we are to vote on this question as we conscientiously believe, we will have to stretch the Constitution a little. Is there a man here who can put his finger on a single clause of the Constitution which will warrant this appropriation?

Mr. HISCOCK. I surrender five minutes of the time to my colleague from New York [Mr COX].

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, this side of the House is challenged in an ironical manner by my colleague as to the constitutionality of this measure. I do not now propose to argue its constitutionality, whether on the preamble, on the "general welfare" clause, or on the clause as to commerce, or on any nebulous, indefinite, humane provision in the Constitution.

Simply let me say that I oppose, now as before, anything that looks like an infraction of the Constitution. I have opposed it on your agricultural bill, sometimes on certain features of census legislation, and often on your Educational Bureau. I have found these extraconstitutional matters vulnerable.

Since the war was over very little impression has been made by such individual protests as mine against such measures of dangerous and outrageous breaches of organic law.

Mr. BAYNE. Let me interrupt you a moment.

Mr. COX, of New York. I can not yield to the gentleman. This is a matter of more serious pith and moment than gentlemen upon the other side seem by their genial way disposed to imagine. Mr. Speaker, we stand in the presence of a great calamity. It is a great national misfortune. These rivers of ours, like human beings at times, have passed their bounds. We are remediless, except by some general Federal benevolence. These freshets, made by improvident legislation on forests and tariffs, overwhelm the heart of our land. Such calamities seem, like a winter's night, so dark that we can neither see our own paths nor the paths of others; so dense with the gloom of the night, that we neither see ourselves as partisans, nor do others see us. God help, in such emergencies.

In the presence of a great calamity I will not scrutinize too urgently or critically for the warrant of the Constitution.

The gentleman from Michigan said that a session or so ago I carried around in my pocket a resolution about feeding Ireland and proposed $300,000 relief. Making allowance for that sort of unveracity which is always humorous, I will say that he will find a decorous and dignified report on that subject from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, written partly by myself. It is a well-considered report, with precedents. These precedents come down from some of the best men of the old Whig and Democratic parties. They are unanswerably cogent. Another illustration: When, sir, it came to adding one more life-saving station at Louisville, during the freshet a year or more ago, did we pause to inquire whether it was based on inland or outland commerce? Did we ask for constitutional authority? No. We gave Louisville her life-saving station during that calamity. Many lives were saved.

I would not always be willing to allow matters of this doubtful constitutionality to pass without challenge. May I recall now a verse which has much sense and more melody? It says:

> The little rift within the lute
> That by-and-bye will make the music mute,
> And, ever widening, slowly silence all.

I would not, like gentlemen on the other side, make the least rift in the accordant music of the State. They must ask themselves the question who it is that has made these rifts in the Constitution; who it is that has been regardless of its provisions; who it is that has sundered the Constitution in twain; who it is that has recklessly squandered money on all sorts of extravagant projects, never having even the sweet mantle of charity to cover them from their multitudinous sins.

The first proposition made for charity since the war came from the other side. Republican members asked us to give certain pork to feed the starving negroes in Alabama. They were about drowned out on the Tombigbee. We know now how that pork was distributed. The American hog played a partisan and not a diplomatic part on that occasion. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOLLETT. I give the gentleman from New York five minutes of my time.

Mr. COX, of New York. I thank the gentleman kindly. I know how painful it is to discuss matters of this kind. Feeling has no words. Emotion is still. Our babble is the tossing buoy, indicating where the anchor is. Why not have voted this measure in graceful silence; and if by our inconsiderate vote there may be any breach of the Constitution, God Almighty in his infinite goodness will pardon and condone it.

But, sir, there are some afflictions which no medicine, no foresight, no wisdom can anticipate or cure.

One of these is the terrific calamity now upon the valley of the Ohio and its confluents. If, sir, I can not give my hand and my head, I will give my heart to this vote. [Applause.]

Mr. FOLLETT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. BAYNE. I would like to have the Clerk read just three or four lines——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. It is refreshing, Mr. Speaker, even in the consideration of so grave a matter as this, to see that some of our Republican friends are asserting there is a Constitution and that there is danger of violating its provisions.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh! the gentleman misunderstands us entirely.

Mr. REAGAN. I suppose I do.

Mr. HISCOCK. You certainly do.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I will go on. Mr. Speaker, there have been a good many things done in the history of this Government for which it might be difficult to point to a precise warrant in the Constitution. But the things which have been so done are not of the class in which the rights of the States or the liberties of the people are involved. They are that class of things, uncontemplated and unforeseen by the framers of the Constitution, that come up to be acted upon by the people in their representative capacity, and all they can do in such cases is to avoid such a violation of the Constitution as trenches upon the powers and rights of the States and upon the liberties and securities of the people.

When the Congress in former years have voted to relieve Italy, when they have voted to relieve Ireland, when they have voted to relieve the people in Alabama, when they have voted to relieve the people on the Mississippi, no right of a State was involved or violated. The liberty of no citizen was involved or was violated. But here to-day we stand in the presence of another great calamity which has fallen upon the people without fault of theirs. Such a calamity has caused every heart to beat by its contemplation—no right of a State involved, the liberty of no citizen involved—and on such an occasion our attention is called to the dangers of violating the Constitution and we are challenged for a warrant for the appropriation of money to relieve the people so situated. Why, sir, in the history of the action of Congress for the last twenty years, when the liberties of the people have been stricken down by the acts of Congress, when the rights of the States have been trampled upon and denied them, we have heard no protest from the Republican side of this House.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh! the gentleman hears none now. Do not misunderstand me.

Mr. REAGAN. The readers of this debate in the RECORD will understand whether I am warranted in saying what I have said.

Mr. Speaker, I have said about all I desire to say. I only wish to add there is nothing in the theory of the Government to forbid what we are doing now; and while there may not be an express declaration of the Constitution that we may appropriate to relieve the calamities of people involved in distress, we have a long line of precedents which have met the approbation of the most illustrious minds of the past, and we know that if we shall do what we are now asked to do we do not violate the Constitution or inflict wrong upon States or wrong upon the people; but, simply representing the great Government of the Union, we say that out of its Treasury we propose to contribute something to the relief of sufferers who may be dying now for the want of it.

Mr. FOLLETT. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND].

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The eagerness of my friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] to carp at and criticise the views of Democrats on this floor has led him into several misstatements of facts. In the first place, this subject is brought into Congress not by a Democrat, but by a Republican. That proposition was brought in here by the gentleman from West Virginia, and on his motion was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The first question raised as to the constitutional power of this Congress to grant this relief is raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]. No Democrat has raised the constitutional question; no Democrat has alluded to it, except simply to answer remarks that have fallen from the lips of gentlemen on the other side. No constitutional question is raised by gentlemen on this side.

Another error in the statement of the gentleman from New York was his statement that Illinois was here in the last Congress hat in hand begging relief from the Federal Government for her sufferers from the floods. The gentleman has no warrant whatever for the assertion. Illinois never appeared in the last or in any other Congress begging charity for her people. Illinois is able to take care of her own destitute and suffering people. Illinois has with alacrity responded to every appeal to her for relief from suffering of her own as well as other people.

The proposition in the last Congress to which the gentleman alludes was not for relief for Ohio River sufferers, but came from the Lower Mississippi. One of the principal reasons urged for its passage was that it was intended to relieve the poor blacks who lived along the Lower Mississippi River. And now, when a proposition is brought forward to relieve the poor and suffering whites on the Ohio, as well as the blacks along that river, that gentleman thinks it is proper for him to carp at and criticise the views and actions of the Democratic members of this House on constitutional questions. Sir, New York has fattened more on the Federal Treasury than any dozen States of this Union. Illinois has in the last twenty years contributed more through the internal-revenue collections to the Federal Treasury than New York or any other State of this Union. This year Illinois paid into the Federal Treasury under the internal-revenue laws over $8,000,000 more than the Empire State of New York.

Mr. COX, of New York. On whisky, which we drank. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. One or two words more, and then I will be through. The floods of the Ohio River have not yet reached their maximum. The highest stage of the flood is still confined to the upper portion of the Ohio. That flood is rolling on and gathering in force as it flows. Those living on the lower Ohio are expecting and anticipating a higher flood than has ever yet afflicted those people.

While I am not standing here asking charity for the people living in the State of Illinois on the border of that river, yet if there is to be an appropriation from the Federal Treasury, I hope as the relief boats go down the Ohio River they will not say, as the gentleman from New York seems to desire them to say, to those struggling in the waters or standing on the shore homeless and without food, "Wait until your State Legislature can assemble and make an appropriation for your relief."

If the Illinois Legislature was in session to-day, I am of the opinion that a resolution of relief would pass the two branches of that Legislature without a word of objection. But the Legislature of Illinois is not in session, and therefore there is need for prompt action to relieve Illinoisans as well as those of six other States, or it will be too late.

I have a dispatch which indicates to me very clearly that the flood will reach a higher stage at points on the Ohio River than ever before. In my own town of Shawneetown, which is located on the Ohio River just below the mouth of the Wabash, and which last year suffered more severely than any other, there are to-day upon the levees three hundred men, with two locomotives, bringing earth from the hills, heroically fighting the floods and doing their utmost to guard against the danger threatened. I have also a dispatch from General Hazen, expressing the belief that it will be impossible for those people to escape inundation. And while our people have expended large sums on their levee and had made it high and strong enough to protect themselves from ordinary overflows, yet I have despaired of hope that they can save themselves in this extraordinary and calamitous emergency.

Notwithstanding I am not here begging charity for Illinois, yet when the gentleman from West Virginia brings in a proposition for the relief of the suffering people in the Ohio Valley I am willing to extend to him a hearty co-operation in this humane work. I am willing to do my utmost to aid in securing relief for those who can not help themselves. This is an emergency against which the people of the locality are utterly unable to guard themselves. It is a calamity which the localities are unable to guard against. They are unable to wait for the slow action of State or private charity. We have the power to quickly relieve them from destitution and from death. As the localities are powerless to furnish immediate and adequate relief, I for one am willing to stretch forth the strong arm of the Federal Government and save them from starvation and destitution.

Mr. FOLLETT. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HISCOCK. Yield to me a minute.

Mr. FOLLETT. I have yielded to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman yield to me a minute right here, for I want to answer the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] now?

Mr. BLOUNT. A little later, please; not now.

I do not take the floor on this occasion with a view of presenting any new thought to the House. I understand the sentiment which animates every one here.

The constitutional question raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] I well understand to be facetious. The gracefulness of this charity I trust will not be marred and has not been marred by a single sentence that has fallen from the lips of any gentleman.

I have not forgotten that sympathy which was shown to my own section years ago. I have not forgotten the suffering of the people of my native State and how generously and unanimously the Congress of the United States responded to their necessity and suffering. Ay, more, I have not forgotten when the yellow-fever attacked various cities along the Gulf of Mexico and the Mississippi River, and an appeal was made here for aid. I have not forgotten that when a proposition was before this House to appropriate—not by estimates, not by detailed statements as to the necessities of the situation—a half million of dollars to be used in the discretion of the Government, and to be used not merely during the immediate emergency, but if need be during a period of three years, for the the relief of those people of my section, there stood forth on the other side of the House, about where the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] now sits, a citizen of the State of Ohio—one of the grandest intellects, if not the grandest, I have witnessed on this floor (I speak not in disparagement of others)—gathering the humanities of this House around that proposition. Without one word of criticism in reference to the Constitution, without any expression save that of a great humanity, that sum was voted. Ay, more, sir, both sides of this House, apprehensive that when Congress might not be in session this same disease might find its way within our borders, have from that time kept the sum of $100,000 at the disposal of the President of the United States to be used, if need be, for purposes of relief. Under these circumstances, sir, I have felt a desire to express myself in behalf of this appropriation, which I doubt not will be granted unstintedly.

Mr. FOLLETT. I now yield to my colleague from the State of Ohio [Mr. JORDAN]. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. JORDAN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] desires to send to the desk and have read a telegram. I yield a moment for that purpose.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. It is a telegram just received this morning.

The Clerk read as follows:

BELLAIRE, OHIO, February 11, 1884.

Hon. J. D. TAYLOR:

No description can equal the terrible destruction and loss caused by the flood. Urge prompt measure of relief through Congress. Bellaire's loss half a million.

C. L. POOREMAN,
D. W. COOPER,
D. H. FARRAH,
For Citizens.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I protest against members of the American Congress making speeches on this resolution when our fellow-beings are drowning. This House is ready to vote. Let us vote instead of making political speeches.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] ought to have thought of that before his side did so much talking.

Mr. JORDAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to occupy the time of the House for any length of time. I am hourly in receipt of telegraphic dispatches from Cincinnati and other places in Ohio. These dispatches represent a condition of affairs which appeals for immediate action on the part of this House. From these and other sources we know that the high water in the Ohio River and its tributaries has brought on the people of six States bordering on the Ohio River great distress. Representing in part the city of Cincinnati, and one of the members of this House from the State of Ohio which is bordered upon one side by the Ohio River for six hundred miles, I feel it my duty to vote for the bill now before the House appropriating $300,000 for the purpose of granting relief to the sufferings of the unhappy victims of this disastrous flood. If I am correctly informed, in my own and many other cities and towns along the Ohio River the water is higher than it ever has been before. Thousands of people are driven from their homes and wander through the streets seeking shelter wherever it may be found, in station-houses, in hospitals, in public places, at the hands of charity. Thousands and tens of thousands of people, homeless and without shelter, clamor for bread and seek for food wherever it can be obtained. Thousands, tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands of people, thrown out of homes and employment, who can not be supplied by local charities, must immediately have food and shelter and protection.

I for one stand here to give my vote and my voice in favor of this bill and to do all that I can to relieve the suffering and distress of our fellow-men. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] asks us if this bill is constitutional. I am glad that no other gentleman on the other side of the House considers the Constitution as any impediment in the way of voting for this bill; and as the gentleman from New York says he has "no constitutional scruples" upon any questions, we will hope that he too will vote for this bill.

I do not know whether this bill is constitutional or not. We have not time to enter into a discussion of this question. While we would stand here debating it the floods would not abate and the people would perish.

This bill does not merely affect Ohio; it affects the States of Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Kentucky, Indiana, and Illinois, and perhaps other States. This bill will afford some relief. It is in the right direction. I sympathize with its objects, I approve its purposes, and I give it my cordial support with my voice and my vote.

I send to the desk to be read a dispatch bearing upon this measure and asking for the relief sought by the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

CINCINNATI, February 11, 1884.

Hon. ISAAC M. JORDAN, M. C.:

Please see dispatch to Senator SHERMAN by Richard Smith and consult. Suffering in Ohio River towns terribly, and river rising and rain-storm prevailing throughout entire valley. River will be several feet higher at this point than flood of last year. Railroads nearly all abandoned. Private charities in river towns can not cope with this disaster. Cincinnati will take care of her own people.

HENRY C. URNO,
Chairman Relief Committee.

Mr. FOLLETT. I now yield five minutes to my colleague [Mr. WARNER]. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I know the House is ready to vote upon this question and will vote the appropriation, but I hope I may be indulged for a moment, as I do not trespass often upon the time of the House, and this measure is one my people are deeply interested in. It has been said on this floor——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to know whether it is in order for gentlemen on that side, after they have consumed all of the time they wanted in this debate, to interrupt or endeavor to prevent this side of the House from being heard?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has endeavored to preserve order, and will again request gentlemen to be seated and cease conversation.

The gentleman from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It has been asked on this floor, Mr. Speaker, if the great State of Ohio is not able to afford relief to its sufferers from this flood without coming to Congress for help. I will say to gentlemen that Ohio is not here as a State asking help. She is undoubtedly able and her people are ready and willing and anxious to afford to the sufferers by these floods all the relief they require.

But that is not the question. This is a question of means, a question of agencies, of ready appliances to afford the needed relief at once. The floods are upon the people now; they are resistless. Hunger is relentless and will not wait. It is immediate help that is needed. The State has no adequate means at hand for affording the relief immediately, and it concerns half a dozen States—the valley of the whole Ohio River. The Government has steamboats; it has prepared rations; it has tents; it has blankets, all at hand. The State of Ohio has none of these appliances, and it can not organize forces nor institute agencies in time to afford that relief which is so absolutely necessary and which the Government can at once afford. This is the only ground on which I should be willing to ask for this appropriation. I have grave doubts myself as to the constitutional authority for such an act, but as the gentleman from Texas has so well said, this is a measure which invades no rights, curtails no liberties, and in no way infringes upon the rights of States. Mingled with the appeals that come to us for help are the cries of children and the petitions of women homeless, shelterless, hungry; and in this presence I can not stop to argue literal construction of the Constitution. I will take the side of mercy and risk it on that.

Hundreds and thousands of dollars have been raised already by our people, but local charity is inadequate to the relief required. I am in favor of self-help always, in favor of communities providing for the relief of the needy among themselves. The people of my own city, the city of Marietta, would not go outside for relief if those who could afford the relief were not under the water themselves, but nearly the whole city is under water. And it is so with many other parts of the valley. Whole communities, entire towns and cities are in distress, and help from outside becomes necessary. There is no time to appeal to the charitable at a distance. Some organized power must step in. That should be the State if States can act quickly enough. But can they? If not, what help adequate to the work is at hand? Many States are concerned. Manifestly the Secretary of War, through the organization under his control and with the means at his disposal, is the only power that can furnish the aid at once and reach all points of the river. This is the nearest and quickest source of relief, and therefore I favor it. The Secretary of War can set agencies at work within an hour from the time this appropriation passes the two Houses of Congress, and that is what is wanted.

Mr. McKINLEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McKINLEY. I wish to know if it will be in order to offer an amendment to this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Unless the previous question is ordered by the House it will be open to amendment.

Mr. FOLLETT. I now yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. McKINLEY. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk to strike out $300,000 and insert $500,000. It has been demonstrated by the arguments of gentlemen upon this question that $300,000 is wholly inadequate, and therefore I offer this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] is entitled to the floor. Does the gentleman yield for this amendment?

Mr. FOLLETT. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON].

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to his colleague to offer an amendment?

Mr. FOLLETT. I do not.

Mr. McKINLEY. I trust my colleague will yield to me. The amendment has been already announced; let it be read from the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I obtained the floor, Mr. Speaker, for that very purpose, and the gentleman from Ohio in control of the floor had yielded to me. I had prepared the amendment which has been lying on my desk ready to be offered at this time.

Mr. McKINLEY. I was recognized by the Speaker; my amendment was announced. My only desire is to have that amendment acted upon. I care not where it comes from.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I ask that the amendment which I sent to the desk be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of the joint resolution the sum proposed, $300,000, and insert in lieu thereof $500,000.

Mr. McKINLEY. I accept that amendment in lieu of my own. I care not where the amendment comes from so the amount appropriated is adequate.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I shall ask to have read a telegram which I have just received from the governor of West Virginia, and while it is being sent to the desk I desire to say simply that the information I have received from that section of the State of West Virginia which lies along the Ohio River induces me to believe that everything that private charity or the local authorities can do to meet the exigency arising from this great calamity has been done, and the people along the Ohio River come up now not as has been suggested by the gentleman from New York, holding out the hand of beggary and asking this Government to extend its charity to the State of Ohio, but appealing to you as the only source from which immediate relief can come, asking you to extend your aid to them in the presence of this great misfortune and afford them the relief which is absolutely necessary for their preservation.

I now ask that the telegram which I have sent to the desk may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WHEELING, W. VA.

I call your attention to the annexed statement of editors of leading West Virginia papers, as also of leading citizens of our State, to the condition of the residents of the Ohio Valley who are rendered homeless and destitute by the recent unprecedented flood. We want help. It is urgent. The amount proposed by the joint resolution of General Goff is inadequate to our relief. We request you to amend the resolution so that at least one million be appropriated. Your prompt action will meet the approval of your constituents, and if relief is granted thousands of destitute will be saved from further suffering.

JACOB B. JACKSON, Governor.

Mr. FOLLETT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON]. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. EATON. Where there are so many members of the House calling for a vote——

Mr. WILKINS. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] will yield to me for that purpose, I will move the previous question.

Mr. FOLLETT. I have yielded five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON. I will be through in a moment. It appears that my good friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] is sorely troubled for fear that this great constitutional question, which does not trouble him at all, will not be brought forward by the member from Connecticut. Sir, I want to say to my friend that whenever in my judgment measures are brought forward here that strike at the very palladium of our liberties I shall oppose them without asking my friend from New York to assist me.

I said nothing upon this subject till my friend from New York volunteered to say that Connecticut ought to be heard and that his colleague from New York ought to be heard. And following him, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] made a most luminous dissertation on State rights. Did that gentleman ever read a word about State rights? [Laughter.] Has he any knowledge of the Constitution or of the rights of the States? [Laughter.] If he has, I hope on this or some other occasion he will exhibit it.

And then comes up my genial friend from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD]. We shall lose him from this House speedily. I think I heard the telephone say that Howard University had already elected him professor of biblical literature. [Great laughter.] We shall be exceedingly sorry to lose him. But I beg leave to say to him that when he enters upon his duties at that university I will come up and listen to some of the Assyrian deluge stories he can tell.

And now, Mr. Speaker, one word more. I have grave doubts, I desire to say—I am not like the gentleman from New York, who is not troubled, he says, with any constitutional scruples—I have grave doubts about the power of this House to pay out the money of the people even in a great calamity like this. But, sir, somebody has remarked in this debate—I think my friend from New York [Mr. COX]—that when the head doubted the heart acted.

I shall not vote against this measure, and yet I take occasion to say, and I say it frankly, that I have very great doubts about the power in this House to appropriate the money of the people even in this great calamity.

Mr. FOLLETT. I desire to say just a word.

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield me one-half minute? [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. FOLLETT. There is an urgent demand for a vote.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I wish to offer another amendment.

Mr. FOLLETT. I desire to say with reference to the amount appropriated by this resolution that the Committee on Appropriations, with all the information that they could get—they were visited by Representatives from nearly all the flooded districts this morning—concluded that, for the present appropriation, $300,000 was the correct sum, and that this appropriation would not tend to cut off, in any measure whatever, private charities or State charities, and where they were possible the local charities of the districts affected. And Congress being in session, if larger appropriations should be necessary the Committee on Appropriations will certainly never stand in the way of making all proper appropriations.

I desire to say one word with reference to the State of Ohio; for it seems that that State is the one that is to be assailed upon this measure. Ohio stands at the front for her charitable institutions and the charity of her people and has always stood in the front, not excepting the great State of New York. And Ohio always will stand there so long as she is populated by the class of people that now control her affairs. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia and upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question on the bill and amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] to the substitute joint resolution reported by the Committee on Appropriations. The amendment will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the joint resolution by striking out "$300,000" and inserting "$500,000."

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio, and others called for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 44, noes 127.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 108, nays 150, not voting 62; as follows:

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. BUDD with Mr. GEORGE.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, with Mr. ROBERTSON.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR with Mr. SENEY.

Mr. RUSSELL with Mr. BELMONT.

Mr. OCHILTREE with Mr. HEWITT, of New York.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE with Mr. JOHN S. WISE.

Mr. SHELLEY with Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.

Mr. KASSON with Mr. HILL.

Mr. ANDERSON with Mr. HANCOCK.

Mr. HOLMES with Mr. BLANCHARD.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, with Mr. KING.

Mr. YOUNG with Mr. VALENTINE.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I am paired on this question with my colleague Mr. JOHN S. WISE, but I desire to state that if I was at liberty to vote, I should vote "no" on the amendment.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I am paired on political questions with my colleague, Mr. SENEY, but not regarding this as a political question, I have voted.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The question was upon agreeing to the substitute reported from the Committee on Appropriations; and being taken, the substitute was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. BURLEIGH. On that question I call for the yeas and nays. I am in favor of appropriating $300,000 for this purpose, but not of appropriating $500,000. I voted against the amendment to appropriate $500,000, as did many others; but many of us desire to record our votes in favor of appropriating $300,000.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 48 in the affirmative—not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I demand a count on the other side.

The negative votes were counted, of which there were 96.

So (one-fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were yeas 234, nays 12, not voting 74, as follows:

YEAS—234.

So the joint resolution was passed.

The following additional pairs were announced.

Mr. HUNT with Mr. LORE.

Mr. LE FEVRE with Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio.

Mr. HUNT. I am paired with Mr. LORE, of Delaware; if I was at liberty to vote, I should vote "ay."

Mr. LE FEVRE. I am paired with my colleague Mr. ROBINSON; but being informed that he would vote in the affirmative on this joint resolution, I have voted.

Mr. ROBERTSON. My colleague Mr. THOMPSON was called out of the Hall some time ago, and desired me to state that if present he would vote "ay" on the passage of this joint resolution.

Mr. FOLLETT moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

NAMING OF A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary read the following communication from the President pro tempore of the Senate:

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, February 12, 1884.

To the Senate:

Pursuant to the power conferred on me by the rules, I hereby name and designate the Senator from Iowa Mr. WILLIAM B. ALLISON to perform the duties of the Chair in my absence from the Senate this day.

GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,
President pro tempore.

Mr. ALLISON thereupon took the chair as presiding officer, and called the Senate to order.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. ANTHONY. I notice from the reading of the Journal that it states 1,000 copies of the Statistical Abstract of the United States were ordered to be printed. It strikes me that the number was 5,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The matter will be examined, and the Journal will be corrected in accordance with the fact if there is an error.

The Journal was approved.

ASTRONOMICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I transmit a communication, under date of the 8th instant, addressed to me by the Secretary of the Navy, covering a report of Professor Simon Newcomb, United States Navy, on the subject of recent improvements in astronomical observatories, instruments, and methods of observations, as noted during his visit to the principal observatories of Europe in the year 1883, made in pursuance of orders of the Navy Department.

The request of the Secretary is commended to the consideration of Congress.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 11, 1884.

Mr. BLAIR. I present the petition of the Good Templars of New Hampshire, signed by George A. Bailey, grand worthy chief templar, and other officers of the order, representing 3,000 members, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating beverages; also the petition of the National Division of the Sons of Temperance, officially signed, representing 70,000 members, praying for a constitutional amendment for the same purpose. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. I present the petition of Good Templars of Oregon, officially signed by Elias Jessup, grand worthy chief templar, and J. E. Houston, grand secretary of the order in that State, representing 5,000 members, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic. I shall not repeat or attempt to add to what has been so well said in regard to this matter, but will content myself with the assertion that of all the questions which are now attracting the attention of the American people and being pressed upon Congress for its consideration, no question is more vitally connected with the health, prosperity, and happiness of the people, with public and private virtue, with the present condition or future growth of the country and the perpetuity of our republican institutions than the question of the alcoholic liquor traffic. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COKE. I present a petition of the Houston Cotton Exchange and Board of Trade of the city of Houston, Tex., reflecting the population, wealth, and commercial importance of that city, praying that a bill now pending in the two Houses of Congress making the city of Houston a port of entry be passed. The petition that I present, adopted on February 7, 1884, refers to another petition presented to Congress in 1882, and I beg leave to present both of them, and move their reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I present resolutions adopted by the common council of the city of Negaunee, Mich., remonstrating against the passage of the bill to forfeit the lands granted to the Marquette, Houghton and Ontonagon Railroad. I ask that the resolutions, which are under the seal of the city, may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan presents certain resolutions and asks that they may be read. They will be read, if there is no objection. The Chair hears none.

The resolutions were read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as follows:

Whereas it appears that the lands granted by the Congress of the United States to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of the Marquette, Houghton and Ontonagon Railroad are in danger of forfeiture and reversion to the United States; and

Whereas the construction of said railroad is vital to this entire section of country, and is dependent upon the donation of said lands; and

Whereas the State of Michigan, by the action of its Legislature, has extended the time for the completion of the said railroad, which time is not yet expired: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved, That it is the sense of the people of this section of country that the State of Michigan should be allowed to carry out its contract with the Marquette, Houghton and Ontonagon Railroad Company, and that the lands set apart by the General Government for the construction of the said railroad should be saved and excluded from forfeiture by the Congress of the United States, and confirmed to the use of the State of Michigan, as at first intended by the act of Congress of June 3, 1856, and acts supplementary thereto, and the Congress is therefore prayed and petitioned in this behalf.

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be asked to use their best efforts to avoid a forfeiture of the said lands and further the object of these resolutions as herein expressed.

Resolved, That the recorder be and hereby is instructed to forward certified copies of these resolutions to our Senators and Representatives in Congress respectively.

I hereby certify that at the regular meeting of the common council of the city of Negaunee, Marquette County, Michigan, held this 7th day of February, 1884, the resolutions hereto attached were unanimously adopted.

BYRON D. JANES,
Recorder City of Negaunee.

Mr. SAWYER presented a petition of the Sons of Temperance of Wisconsin, officially signed, representing 845 members, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented the petition of William H. Clark, jr., and 60 others, citizens of Florence County, Wisconsin, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 691) to confirm and declare legal the acts of certain officers of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SLATER. I present certain affidavits and papers relating to the claim set forth in the bill (S. 819) for the relief of Avery D. Babcock and wife. I move that they be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to be considered in connection with the bill now before that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SLATER. I present a petition numerously signed by citizens of Lane County, Oregon, addressed to myself and my colleague but evidently intended as a memorial to Congress, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the channel of the Sinslaw River, in that State. I ask that it may be received and referred to the Committee on Commerce as a memorial to Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be received by unanimous consent, and so referred.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MAXEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report adversely the bill (S. 809) to indemnify the State of California for balances paid and remaining due on account of indebtedness incurred in Indian wars, for the payment of which said State issued bonds in 1851 and 1852, a part of which remain unpaid owing to delays occasioned by War Department rulings under the act of Congress of August 5, 1854. By direction of the committee I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to placing the bill on the Calendar?

Mr. MAXEY. I have no objection to its going on the Calendar, except that I think we should not encumber the Calendar with adverse reports in such a way as to prevent the disposition of meritorious cases reported favorably.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 997) for the relief of David A. Williams, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the President's message on the subject, reported a bill (S. 1496) to accept and ratify certain agreements made with the Sioux Indians, and to grant a right of way to the Dakota Central Railway Company through the Sioux reservation in Dakota; which was read twice by its title, and, on motion of Mr. DAWES, recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HALE. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 698) to authorize the construction of additional steel vessels for the Navy, to report it with an amendment. I wish to give notice that at an early day, as I deem this a most important bill, I shall ask the Senate to consider it, and hope that it may have an early passage. There is a report accompanying the bill which I suppose under the rules will be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All reports are printed.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 875) for the relief of Charles C. Hill, of Urbana, Ohio, reported it adversely.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the bill placed on the Calendar until I can see the nature of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. SEWELL. I am also instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 906) for the relief of Napoleon B. Drummond, to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, as there is a general law in force giving the Secretary of War authority to do what the bill calls for.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. COLQUITT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of William Allen, a soldier in the Mexican war, praying that a pension be granted to him on account of disabilities incurred in that war, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

PAY OF POSTMASTERS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the order of "concurrent or other resolutions" the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES].

The resolution submitted by Mr. VOORHEES, on the 8th instant, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be directed to report to the Senate the cause or causes of delay, if any, on the part of the Department of Justice in advising the Postmaster-General as to the proper construction of the act of March 3, 1883, in relation to the salaries and pay of postmasters, the question of the proper construction of said act having been referred by the Postmaster-General to the Attorney-General on the 25th of August, 1883, and no answer having yet been made thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. VOORHEES. I was struck with the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in regard to the resolution, but after thinking the matter over I do not know that I care to change it, or, if I did, I should not know how to change it to call upon the Attorney-General for the information there sought in any different manner. As the Senator from Ohio says, it is unusual to ask one head of a Department why he is delaying the business of the Government by not responding to a proper request on the part of another head of a Department; but it is likewise unusual that such a request made by the head of a Department upon the Attorney-General should rest unanswered for the space of six months.

The matter, and I state it so that every Senator may have it clearly in his mind, is simply this: On the 3d of March last we passed an act, simple as we thought in its character, requiring the Postmaster-General to adjust the pay and salaries of certain postmasters. After a very considerable delay, during which nothing was done to execute the law, it was referred to the Attorney-General by the Postmaster-General, as he informs me himself, with a request to be advised in regard to certain legal propositions growing out of it. That reference was made on the 25th of last August, and to this hour no answer has been made to it.

I have not acted hastily upon this matter, nor with any desire to embarrass the Attorney-General or to bring him into disrepute, or anything of the kind; nor have I acted upon it until after consulting with the Postmaster-General himself. He having failed to get the information which he desired and to which he was entitled, I have undertaken simply to help him. If the Senator from Ohio or anybody else has any other or better plan than that which I have adopted, I will gladly accept his and abandon mine; but in the absence of anything offered I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. The act to which the resolution relates was approved March 3, 1883. It appears to be a tolerably plain law. There does not appear to be much difficulty in the construction of it to a simple, plain-minded man. But it appears that the Postmaster-General has found some difficulty in its execution, and thereupon, as the Senator from Indiana says, six months ago or more he referred that question to the Attorney-General, under a privilege which he has under the statutes; and it seems that the Attorney-General has not as yet been able to make up his mind as to what is the proper construction of the law. In the mean time the will of Congress goes unexecuted. We are estopped and forbidden in fact, either by courtesy or in some other way, from executing our own will, passed through both Houses and approved by the President, for the compensation of these postmasters.

The debt is a just one; nobody disputes that. Congress has provided for it; and it seems that the Postmaster-General has met with some doubt or difficulty in respect merely of the construction of the law. I do not know that we have any power to require the Attorney-General to respond to this request of the Postmaster-General as to the construction of the law, but we certainly have the power to ask the Postmaster-General where his difficulty is, and if the Attorney-General does not see proper to answer it on his part, if we are advised of what the difficulty is perhaps we can answer it.

I think that the Senator from Indiana would perhaps better his resolution by directing it to the Postmaster-General and asking him to state to the Senate what are his difficulties in the execution of the law, so that if they appear to be serious when his statement or explanation comes here we can modify the act or pass a joint resolution construing it. I dislike very much to make any complaint about a matter of this kind, and I do not know that I have any rightful ground to do it, for I take it for granted that the Attorney-General has been diligent as he thinks he ought to be in the investigation and decision of this question so far as the decision of it rests with him; but we ought not to stop in the discharge of a duty that we owe to these postmasters merely because these two functionaries of the Government can not agree between themselves as to the proper line of action.

I hope, therefore, that the Senator from Indiana will modify his resolution so as to require the Postmaster-General to state to the Senate what are his difficulties in the execution of the law, and then see if we can remedy them.

Mr. VOORHEES. We should be no nearer accomplishing a practical purpose than we are now if the course indicated by the Senator from Alabama was adopted. In response to a resolution the Postmaster-General has already stated that he encountered doubts as to the proper construction of the law, and then under the statute he resorted to the law officer of the Government, as he had a right to do, to be instructed. Suppose we should ask him now, "What were your doubts?" and he should write and send to us a statement of his legal difficulties in detail, should we be any nearer accomplishing the execution of the law than we are now? Certainly not. Should we then determine here how the law should be construed and send him word? Let us look practically at the matter and see what we should accomplish by the course pointed out by the Senator from Alabama. I say we should not have made an inch of progress, whereas the Postmaster-General, seeking a legal opinion to be guided by from the Attorney-General, if that can be obtained for him, the Postmaster-General will go on and act upon that opinion, or if the opinion is such that the law can not be executed we shall be advised of that fact.

I do not wish to reflect upon the head of any Department, but it does seem to me after waiting here almost one year with not a single step taken toward the execution of the law, we should act promptly and see where the trouble is. I have accomplished, if no more, at least one revelation, which is that the Postmaster-General is not in fault. The Postmaster-General has done what the law required him to do; where doubts arose in his mind about the proper construction of a law he has asked the opinion of the law officer of the Government. There is no reason given why that opinion has not been forthcoming. That is what I want to know now. Six months' delay is enough. What I want to know is why the opinion is not forthcoming from the law officer of the Government, or have it sent to us at once.

As I said, if there was any other way pointed out to accomplish this object more accurately or more speedily than that which I have indicated I would be glad to adopt it, for the method indicated by the Senator from Alabama does not seem to me to make any progress whatever.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, the bill which became a law on the 3d of March last was reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of this body. In that committee I was appointed a subcommittee and I think the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] was with me to consider the subject. I investigated the matter very thoroughly and reported to the committee, stating the law of the case and the difficulties which had occurred and all the circumstances attending the immense increase in population in the Western States and Territories rendering a readjustment of the salaries under the acts of 1854, 1856, 1864, and 1866 a necessity. The bill was reported after a very careful investigation by the Post-Office Committee, came to the Senate, and passed the Senate not without debate, but after debate in the Senate. It was thoroughly investigated here and met the approbation of the Senate and the House of Representatives and became a law. If the law was not readily comprehensible, no one in the Senate was able to find the defects, for it passed after discussion here without any difficulty and everybody seemed to understand it. It was a simple, plain proposition to pay postmasters who had actually and honestly done work according to the law and proper payment for which had been refused by a construction placed on the law by the Postmaster-General. That was the whole of it, and it amounted to a great deal to these poor men scattered throughout the country.

I speak now from the fact of my connection with the bill reported. If there be any difficulty about it, I should like to have the difficulty explained. The object of the law is just, and it ought to be executed and the men ought to get their money. The Postmaster-General having called upon the Attorney-General six months ago for his opinion, and thousands of people throughout the country being interested, it seems to me that the time has come when we ought to have the advice which the Attorney-General may think proper to give to the Postmaster-General, or if he does not feel called upon to give any at all, we ought to know that. So I think the resolution of the Senator from Indiana is respectful and proper.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, this is another striking illustration of the law's delay. The act we passed on the 3d of March, 1883, was to require the adjustment of the salaries of postmasters under a law that was passed in 1866. The money that these postmasters had earned was due in 1866, and they have been waiting eighteen years under the terms of a statute which the Postmaster-General refused to execute, for the money that was theirs under the simplest and plainest provisions of law. That is now a period of nearly twenty years.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator pardon me a moment?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAXEY. I am going to make a statement and the Senator can probably recollect the name of the case; it may have been in his own State. I know the fact that I took the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in that case and used the phraseology pointed out by the court as to what should be the character of the bill that would settle the claims.

Mr. INGALLS. I recall the circumstance well and thank the Senator for mentioning the fact; but I wish to recur again to the fact that this statute of 1883 was passed because the Postmaster-General refused to execute the law of 1866; and when we had passed that law for the purpose of making an emphatic declaration that these men were entitled to the earnings which under this readjustment they would receive, instead of executing the statute or endeavoring to make it effective the Postmaster-General sends it to the Attorney-General for the purpose of receiving his construction upon a doubtful point of interpretation. My understanding of the duties of executive officers is that when a statute is passed they are to carry out its provisions in accordance with the manifest intent and purpose and design of the law-making power if it can be ascertained from the terms of the statute itself. No man can read this law or peruse the debates that preceded its passage without knowing exactly what was intended, and I am exceedingly surprised that the Postmaster-General should have felt called upon not to execute the law but to ascertain if possible reasons why he should not execute it.

I do not understand that the Postmaster-General has any authority of law to call upon the Attorney-General for his opinion as to the interpretation of a statute. The Attorney-General is the legal adviser of the President; and when the Postmaster-General is directed to perform an act by a statute it appears to me that if its purpose can be ascertained he should carry it out and not wait for the law officer of the Government to suggest to him certain doubts or reasons why the law of Congress should be nullified.

The resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana in my judgment will not meet the difficulty of which we here complain. The law was referred in August last to the Attorney-General for his opinion. Whether it was because he did not think he was obliged to respond or for some other reason we do not know, but he has not responded, and we are not in a position, so far as I understand it, of compelling him to respond. He is not responsible to us for any dereliction of duty in connection with a demand made upon him by the Postmaster-General; but I should like an authoritative interrogatory put to the Postmaster-General to know why it is that after we have twice, at an interval of seventeen years, enacted statutes clear and specific in their terms for the performance of a simple clerical duty in the computation of the amounts that were due to certain postmasters under the plain terms of a statute, we are still met with a declaration that it is impossible for the Postmaster-General to understand what was meant, and therefore the law can not be executed.

I hope the Senator from Indiana will put this query, this demand for information, upon some more solid and substantial ground, for it seems to me that we have been trifled with, that there is not a disposition to carry out the provisions of this law, but to find some reason for not carrying them out. The Postmaster-General is responsible to us, and the Attorney-General is responsible to us, but I do not think that we are in a position to call upon the Attorney-General for the reasons why he does not respond to a question submitted to him by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, the frame of the resolution is somewhat singular because of the fact that the proceeding itself we are trying to get at is somewhat singular. On investigating it and comparing it with the proceedings we have already had on this subject, I think the Senator from Indiana is simply within the line of the law. The Postmaster-General sent to the Senate on the 31st day of January a response to a resolution which was introduced by the Senator from Indiana calling for information on this subject, which I ask the Secretary to read from page 1079 of the RECORD.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 31, 1884.

SIR: In response to Senate resolution, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to report to the Senate the cause or causes of delay, if any, in the adjustment of the salaries and pay of postmasters under the act of Congress of March 3, 1883, and whether, in his opinion, any further legislation is necessary on this subject"—

I have to say—

First. That upon consideration of the act of March 3, 1883, in connection with the acts of July 1, 1864, and the proviso to the act of June 12, 1866, a doubt arose in my mind as to the proper construction of the act referred to in the resolution. In order that I might be properly advised, the matter was, on the 25th day of August, 1883, referred to the Attorney-General, where it is still pending. This is the cause of delay in the adjustment referred to.

Second. In response to that portion of the resolution asking if, in my opinion, any further legislation is necessary, I have to say that until I am advised by the Attorney-General as to the proper construction to be placed on the act under consideration I shall be unable to report to your honorable body what, if any, additional legislation is necessary.

Very respectfully,

W. Q. GRESHAM,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. GEO. F. EDMUNDS,
President of the Senate.

Mr. GARLAND. We are brought to the fact that the Postmaster-General has come to the point of doubt to such an extent that he can not execute this law without advice from the Attorney-General, the law officer of the Government. He transmitted the matter to the law officer for his opinion, and there it rests. We are placed now judicially, so to speak, in possession of that fact.

Now, what is the Senate to do? The Senate can not say, supposing it had the authority to say it to the Postmaster-General, "Go on and execute this law notwithstanding the doubt." The Postmaster-General has shown that he has done all he can under the law, and he has appealed to the fountain of light for light on this subject. The statute of 1789 limited these inquiries upon the Attorney-General to the President himself, and we never had a statute until 1870 allowing the different heads of Department to call upon the Attorney-General for his opinion. In 1870 this statute was passed on that subject:

The head of any Executive Department may require the opinion of the Attorney-General on any questions of law arising in the administration of his Department.

Now, he is called on for his opinion according to the statute of 1870. The head of an Executive Department, the Post-Office Department, calls on the Attorney-General under the statute for information. Section 361 of the Revised Statutes goes further still, and says:

The officers of the Department of Justice, under the direction of the Attorney-General, shall give all opinions and render all services requiring the skill of persons learned in the law necessary to enable the President and heads of Departments, and the heads of bureaus and other officers in the Departments, to discharge their respective duties.

That is a part of the statute of 1870, neither of which provisions existed until 1870, and up to that time there had been no law on the subject, except the statute of 1789, which simply authorized the President himself to receive opinions from the Attorney-General.

The Postmaster-General has brought himself within the statute. He has waited for an opinion upon this subject. He can not proceed until he gets that opinion for his information. Of this fact the Senate is placed, so to speak, in judicial possession. Now, what is the Senate to do? That is the question. It is useless to inquire of the Postmaster-General, because the matter is not before him; it has been sent to another Department, where it is pending. We have simply to call on that Department to know why it does not execute the law, the statute of 1870, and respond to the Postmaster-General by giving the information desired. I do not see any objection to that; I think it is perfectly proper.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, we can address a resolution of this kind to the Attorney-General. He can answer it by saying, "I have not got my mind made up; I have not come to a conclusion about this vexed, difficult question of construction;" and then shall we mandamus him and tell him to make up his mind and tell him to send an opinion in here, good or bad? We can not reach any conclusion in that way. But it appears to me that there is a disposition on the part of all of them to keep back this knotty question from the Senate and to cut us off from an opportunity of making a further explanation of it by a joint resolution or a law if we see proper to do so. I want to get that doubt before the Senate. The Postmaster-General could very well, under the resolution that was addressed to him, have stated to the Senate the nature of the doubt which arose in his mind.

I do not understand that the act referred to by the Senator from Arkansas transferred the jurisdiction to decide this question to the Attorney-General, as would be the case in a litigation, for instance, in the Supreme Court between private parties. I do not understand that the Senate is to be shut off from all opportunity of considering this question for itself and resolving this doubt by the mere fact that two executive officers of the Government, both of them lawyers, have been unable to resolve it for themselves. It is not in the nature of an appeal from the Postmaster-General to the Attorney-General; there is no appeal pending, and there is no question stated so far that we have any knowledge of; or, at all events, if there is an appeal pending, I want to know the question on which that appeal rests, so as to see if we can not give these able lawyers some assistance in its solution.

The Postmaster-General was promoted to his present position from the judicial bench of the United States, and we all know that he is an able lawyer. I should be very glad indeed to know what difficulty that able lawyer has found in the execution of this law, and I believe that we shall get it much quicker if the Senator from Indiana will modify his resolution so as to direct the Postmaster-General to certify to the Senate the question of doubt upon which he has hung fire so long. We can not get it in any other way.

If this resolution passes, and the Attorney-General chooses to say, as he has a right to say, "I have not as yet, after due diligence and faithful inquiry, made up my mind upon this proposition," we then have not got anything to go upon, but must wait his pleasure and let this Congress adjourn and these creditors of the Government go unsatisfied of their well-recognized debts, as the Senator from Kansas said, now about eighteen years old. I hope that the Senator from Indiana will modify his resolution, because I believe in that way we shall get the real question before the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I think perhaps I may be able to throw a little light upon this question by stating what has occurred in my experience.

Soon after I came here, before the holidays, I received a letter from one of those persons who come within the purview of the law, a postmaster, who would be entitled to a certain amount of money, which letter was accompanied by a circular from a claim agent in Washington, whose name it is not necessary for me to mention. The writer of the letter asked me if it was necessary that he should employ the lawyer, who proposed to collect this money for 25 per cent. of the claim. I referred that letter, with the circular, to the Postmaster-General, with the inquiry whether or not it would be necessary for this postmaster to employ counsel to collect his claim. He replied by saying that the question, about which he had doubt, had been referred to the Attorney-General, and that the Attorney-General had not replied to him, and that it was not necessary to employ a lawyer and to pay him a part of the money to which the postmaster was unquestionably entitled.

I do not know whether this delay has been occasioned with a view of aiding claim agents or not. I make no such intimation or reflection; but it is a very remarkable circumstance, to say the least of it, that this inquiry was referred to the Attorney-General more than six months ago and that he has not deigned even to reply to it.

I therefore hope the resolution which the Senator from Indiana has offered will be passed by the Senate, and that that officer will at least reply to the Senate why it is that he fails to make a response in one way or another to the Postmaster-General.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from South Carolina allow me to call his attention to the concluding clause of the proviso of the act of 1883?

And that each payment made shall be by warrant or check on the Treasurer or some assistant treasurer of the United States, made payable to the order of said applicant, and forwarded by mail to him at the post-office within whose delivery he resides, and which address shall be set forth in the application above provided for.

There is very little room there for claim agents, I should say, under the provisions of that law.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know how much room there would be under that provision. It seems to me it might be very easily evaded by a power of attorney from the claimant to a claim agent. I do not know that that is the cause of the delay; I do not charge it; but I state the fact that these men have been kept out of the payment of their money now for nearly twenty years. It is a very simple proposition. The Postmaster-General may be, and I think is, perfectly right in desiring the opinion of the law officer of the Government as to any doubt he may have in the execution of the law. I for one am frank to say that I can not understand why that officer should hesitate at least to make a response to that inquiry, which I take to have been respectful.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I want to say, in addition to what the Senator from South Carolina has just stated, that the country is full of these circulars addressed to old postmasters and their heirs. They represent that this law was framed and passed through the influence of one claim agent and that it goes by his name, and that it is necessary for anybody who has anything due him under that act to employ this man. It is accompanied with a power of attorney and directions to send back the claim to him immediately or the time will expire.

Massachusetts is flooded with these circulars, and the recipients of them have sent them to me in such number that I have been obliged to get printed a reply to them, in which I stated that there was nothing due under any such law as that to any of them which any of their Representatives or their Senators could not obtain for them just as well as by their employing any claim agent in the city of Washington, and that I knew of no law which had been passed, there called the Spalding act, which was the creature of the gentleman who sent out this circular. When I came here to Washington I addressed a letter to the Postmaster-General very much in the terms stated by the Senator from South Carolina, and I stated to him that I had informed all these men that there was no occasion for them to employ anybody, and that there was no such relation of any claim agent to this act as to render it necessary, and that I should be glad if he would state to me just what was necessary for each one of these claimants to do to entitle him to what was due under the act. In reply he stated to me that all that was necessary was for the claimant to state when he was appointed postmaster and when he ceased to be postmaster; that all the rest was matter of record in the Post-Office Department, and would be settled immediately, as soon as he could get the opinion from the Attorney-General.

I think that the executive department should protect these claimants from any claim agent who sends his printed circular around the country in this way. I do not know this claim agent; I do not wish to say anything disparaging of him, for he is a stranger to me; but no claim agent can fairly and honestly send around printed circulars to claimants telling them that it is necessary for them to employ, upon a large percentage, him or any other claim agent to see that honest and fair claims upon this Government are liquidated.

Mr. BUTLER. Twenty-five per cent.

Mr. DAWES. Twenty-five per cent.; I believe the Senator is correct. This matter ought to be disposed of and disposed of at once. Whether it should be under the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana, I do not know; and whether the fault is in the Attorney-General's office, I can not say; but the fault is somewhere, the fault is in the Executive Departments. The law originally was sufficient. The law of last winter was only an attempt to enforce existing law; and now there is no occasion for delay, much less for anybody in the city of Washington to exact of these people who have waited these many years twenty-five or any other per cent. of what ought to have been paid them without any effort of this kind by the Government itself.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, after the discussion which has taken place, and with every disposition on my part to be instructed by it, I do not see how I can modify this resolution to accomplish the purpose I have in view, nor do I see what the subject of claim agents has to do with this stage of the affair. I have never seen a claim agent connected with this subject; I have never received a letter or a circular about it. My attention was called to the subject by some old grizzly-looking postmaster, who said he had some interest in the matter, that he could not get his rights, and, being always for the oppressed, I concluded that I would see what was the occasion of delay.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Indiana permit me a word?

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. MAXEY. The law specially requires that the money shall be paid to the claimants personally.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is an answer. I hope that is heard by everybody.

Mr. BUTLER. What is it?

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Texas, late chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, tells me that the law especially requires the money to be paid directly to the claimant, and not to claim agents. I think they can protect themselves. I hope that answer will be carefully remembered. I did not know that that was the case. I have that much more information than I had when I rose on this subject.

A word or two in regard to this proceeding to obtain information.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] placed this in an unanswerable light. The law gives the Postmaster-General the authority to call on the Attorney-General to construe the law for him. It gives the head of one Department the right to call on the law officer of the Government to solve doubts which he has. If he is not there for that purpose, what is he there for? If he is not there to answer as to the proper interpretation of the laws of the country, I do not know what purpose he would serve in the economy of this Government.

As stated by the Senator from Arkansas, we have given authority to the heads of Departments to interrogate him where a question of doubt arises in their minds. In other words, he is made to aid the other heads of Department in the execution of the law. We have made him subordinate to their request for an opinion in writing. We having done this by law, has he the right to say he will not do it? There is the point. Has he the right to say, in the face of an express statute which gives the Postmaster-General the right to call on him for an interpretation of the law, that he will not give it? Has he the right to say he will not give it for six months, or for six years, or never, if he chooses? If so, legislation is sadly needed on this subject.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] in his remarks seemed to suggest that the Attorney-General might tell us that he would not answer.

Mr. MORGAN. That he had not made up his mind.

Mr. VOORHEES. Well, that amounts to the same thing. We could then ask him if he had any mind to make up. There should be some remedy for that; and if we have the right to call upon him and he has the right to say he has not made up his mind to-day, to-morrow, next day, or forever, he can nullify any law of this kind. That will not do. After waiting the proper time for a reasonable man to discuss a reasonable question, he has got to answer. It would be the merest evasion to say that he had not made up his mind. If that is allowed, all I have to say is that the law-making power having devolved upon the Attorney-General the duty of answering another head of a Department he is within the scope of our action, and we have a right to ask him why he does not obey that law of our making. We made the law by which the Attorney-General is asked this question; the Congress of the United States made the law that placed him at the service of the other Departments. Suppose he turns around on us and says, "Although your law makes me the adviser of these Departments, I will not make up my mind, I will not obey that law," may we not ask him why? That is all this resolution does. We ask him why he does not obey the law which has been cited by the Senator from Arkansas that is binding on him, that makes him the legal adviser of the Departments. This question has gone to him properly. The Postmaster-General has done his duty in referring it there, as he has done. I shall not stop to interrogate the Postmaster-General to say what are your doubts, what are your legal difficulties. Why not? Because it would be a futile waste of time. Suppose he should explain all his doubts, then what? Could we solve them for him? We are not in an attitude to do it. We are in no relation to him to advise him how to solve his doubts, even though he detailed them to us. But the law gives him a legal adviser at his elbow, to whom he submitted the question six months ago, and who has sat silently, without responding, in disobedience of law.

The more I think of this question, the more I am satisfied that the Senator from Arkansas has placed it upon bed-rock which can not be assailed. The Attorney-General is made a creature of Congress to obey some such call as the Postmaster-General has made upon him, and that call having been made and not answered, we have the right to ask him why he has not obeyed, not the call of the Postmaster-General, but the law which we have made and which makes him the adviser of each head of Department.

I am satisfied that the resolution is right, that instead of its being harmful it will be useful. I know nothing about the details of this law, even of March 3, 1883. I know nothing about any difficulties that have surrounded the question heretofore. I have not known how long these people have been kept out of their rights until it was stated by the Senator from Kansas. But I do know that when Congress has passed a law it is the duty of the proper head of Department to execute it, and I know that if doubts arise in his mind he has the right under the statutes of the United States to ask the Attorney-General for his legal advice; and I do know that it is the duty of that officer to give that advice or vacate the premises and let somebody occupy them who will.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I stated from memory that the law provided that the warrant for the pay of these postmasters should go directly to the claimant in each instance and not to an agent, and that thereby they were saved from any exactions on the part of agents. I stated it from memory, but since then I have got the law, and I will read that proviso placed there by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads intelligently and adopted by the Senate and by the House of Representatives:

Provided, That every readjustment of salary under this act shall be upon a written application signed by the postmaster or late postmaster or legal representative entitled to said readjustment; and that each payment made shall be by warrant or check on the Treasurer or some assistant treasurer of the United States, made payable to the order of said applicant, and forwarded by mail to him at the post-office within whose delivery he resides, and which address shall be set forth in the application above provided for.

The act was approved March 3, 1883, and guards the rights of the claimants as carefully in my judgment as any act ever has done.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I have no sort of doubt about the power and the right of the Postmaster-General to make this inquiry of the Attorney-General. I have no sort of doubt as to what the duty of the Attorney-General is when he receives a communication of that sort. All that I said in reference to claim agents was to emphasize the necessity of some such resolution as that introduced by the Senator from Indiana. I was not aware of the provisions of law as read by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. VOORHEES. And I was not, either.

Mr. BUTLER. Therefore it is not at all surprising that these claimants residing in remote parts of the country were not apprised of its provisions. Certainly if United States Senators are not, it is not surprising that these gentlemen should not be aware of the provisions of the law. I know the fact that claim agents have sent circulars, for I have seen them, and in stating what I did about one which a gentleman sent to me, I did not desire to be understood as making any reflection whatever on the claim agent. I do not know this one. He may be a very reputable man.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator will pardon me, I will say that the committee had in view the very point. We regarded 25 per cent. as too much, and for that reason we made the pay go direct to the claimant and not to an agent. The purpose was to protect the claimants.

Mr. BUTLER. I think that is a very wise and proper provision, but the fact is nevertheless that these circulars have been sent to these claimants, and I have no doubt that claim agents have a great number of these very claims in their possession to be collected at 25 per cent. through the ignorance of the law by the claimants. I only stated that fact to emphasize and to insist upon the Senate taking some action by which this law can be enforced. If that is the necessary way to do it I hope the resolution will be passed promptly and sent to the Attorney-General, and let him say to the Senate whether or not he proposes to treat with contempt the action of this body.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have not the slightest fault to find. I only wished to explain my own attitude in this matter, and that was the only reason I referred to claim agents at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 154) authorizing the Secretary of War to use rations for the relief of destitute persons in the district overflowed by the Ohio River and its tributaries, and making an appropriation to relieve the sufferers by said overflow; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1511) to prohibit officers and employés of the United States from contributing money for political purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. VOORHEES. In connection with the bill I have introduced, if the Senate will indulge me a moment I should like to say a few words.

It is perfectly notorious and known, I think, to all, that at this time, in spite of existing laws and in violation of them, political assessments are going on pretty much the same as ever. Men are not required to contribute, perhaps; and it may be said in one sense they voluntarily contribute; but it is simply that voluntary action which is produced by fear of losing his place, performed for the purpose of making himself solid and square with political managers.

I am prepared to show under proper circumstances the fact that money for political purposes is being raised now throughout the various Departments of this Government. The bill which I have introduced is the only bill and the only legislation which will cure this evil; that is, to make it a penal offense on the part of the contributor to make such contributions; not merely to punish the offender, but to punish the man who pays. That may seem like harsh legislation; so it does; yet ninety-nine out of every hundred of the officials desire such legislation, desire to be armed with such an answer to those political managers and machine bosses who come here and walk through these corridors and look at clerks with a significance which is well understood. I have seen some of these gentlemen around here within the last few weeks flitting about like birds of prey, of evil omen. I wish to arm the poor clerk—who needs every cent he gets and more, too, to support his wife and children—with an answer to these men that he can not contribute money for such purposes without laying himself liable to the penalties of the law.

I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I invoke the attention of that committee to its provision as the only one that will cure the evil we all profess to abhor so much. I am not saying this as a reproach to any particular political party. I expect that any party in power would to a greater or less degree do the same thing; but if we are going to cure the evil of raising money for political purposes, the punishment must be applied to the action of the contributors as well as the offenders. I say now in the presence of the Senate of the United States, and in the hearing of the country, that all the influences combined which threaten the purity and stability of our institutions sink into utter insignificance in comparison with the corrupt use of money. It is growing more and more prevalent every year, and it will sap and mine the very foundations of this Government, as every Senator knows who is listening to me, and it becomes us in every way possible to set our face against it.

We have heard much about civil-service reform. I wish once more to see the olden time when a man who proposed to use money to influence elections would have lost his rank and standing in society as much as a horse-thief. I wish those times to come again; perhaps they never will.

I have said what I have said to-day for the purpose of arresting the attention of the Senate and the Judiciary Committee to the provisions of the bill which I have introduced.

Mr. HAWLEY. That subject has been before now given to the consideration of the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment. I think the bill naturally belongs there. I have no pride of opinion about it, and am quite willing it should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, for if anybody in the world can discover that it is right to say to any man that he shall give nothing to any political purpose, I think that committee can discover it. My objection to the law going to the extent proposed by the Senator from Indiana is that the effort would be utterly useless and it would be against the common and natural rights of mankind, and would be one of the most justly unpopular and most swiftly condemned measures we could pass. We already forbid any Government officer of any description from making solicitations for contributions for political purposes. We forbid any one, whether a Government officer or not, from going into any Government building or on any Government property where men are employed and soliciting contributions. We also declare emphatically that no man shall be put up or down or in any way honored or dishonored whether he shall give or shall not give to any political purpose.

Mr. DAWES. Does not the law go further and say that no person shall solicit contributions in any public place, whether he be an officer or not?

Mr. HAWLEY. I thought I said that. I intended to say it. No person, whether an officer of the Government or not, shall go into any public building of any description, or upon Government lands where people are employed, and solicit contributions.

Mr. VOORHEES. But they do so.

Mr. HAWLEY. If they do, they are liable to be punished and ought to be punished. We have done everything that can be done, I think, to make the Government employé feel absolutely free in his position and to protect him there, and to discourage and punish any officer of the Government who shall solicit him because he is an employé of the Government.

Mr. DAWES. Or any individual.

Mr. HAWLEY. Or anybody else in a Government building; but to say that no man who happens to be in the service of this Government shall give anything for the support of any political measure or purpose if he wishes to give, is put under no fear in case of refusal, is in no danger for not giving, is an extraordinary and unjustifiable measure, and we ought to be ashamed to put such a law on the book against American citizens. I am an officer of the Government in a certain sense—precisely what I do not know under the law, for we have had dispute about that. I claim the right to give to any honest political purpose. I will join the Senator from Indiana in all possible measures, I do not care how vigorous, you may even say savage, in punishing anything in the nature of political corruption; but gentlemen make an extraordinary mistake in such speeches as that of our distinguished friend. They seem to suppose that everything political is dishonorable, whereas true politics, next to the service of God, is the most honorable work in which a man can be engaged. If the distinguished Senator should come to my town I should consider myself perfectly justifiable in contributing toward the expense of a public hall for the sake of hearing him. I will not say that I should do that in order that the Republican party might be strengthened, but I should do it because I would be glad to hear an eloquent and able argument on that side of the question; and yet I could be punished under the proposition he suggests for doing that; or if I should subscribe $5 to circulate one of his speeches here, I should be punished; or a clerk in a Government Department who might wish to circulate a speech of the Senator, and was willing to buy a few copies to mail to his friends, could be punished for doing it. See to what a ridiculous extreme it is proposed to carry this!

I am in favor of sensible, energetic, and correct civil-service reform, but I trust I shall have courage enough to say that such trash as we sometimes hear out of this Chamber is not for us to put into legislation.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I think the bill offered by the Senator from Indiana is the same bill that was presented by a committee of this body within the last two or three years, word for word.

Mr. VOORHEES. It is.

Mr. BECK. The same bill that was voted for, I believe, by all on this side of the House on the yeas and nays within the last eighteen months. The same argument was made then that is made now by the Senator from Connecticut, that the employés were protected. The Senator from Indiana avows that he has the facts in his possession that they are not, and it is painfully apparent that the thing is being done, but not by members of Congress and Senators now as it used to be. They get clear of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Curtis case by sending their clerks to do what they used to do themselves, and they do not go into the public offices perhaps as publicly as they used to do, but they follow the poor employés to their rooms and let them understand that they are not authorized to dismiss them, but Senator So-and-so desires to know how much they will voluntarily contribute, and the man knows that if he does not voluntarily contribute that much off goes his head.

The law we passed on that subject is known to be no improvement on the act of 1876, which the President of the United States told us was being avoided, and he said that we ought to pass a law to prevent its violation. It has never been done. Besides, the law you have only reaches the little Department clerks here at Washington, and many of them are poor; they can hardly live now; but in the internal-revenue offices and in the post-offices all over the country the thing is going on to-day.

I do not know that I have a right to tell matters that come before the Committee on Finance, but there have been men before this body seeking for confirmation where it was avowed and proved that they had retained a great part of the salaries of their employés, 10, 12, or 15 per cent., to be used for sending delegates to political conventions. While it would be very hard to pass a law to prevent the Senator from Connecticut from subscribing for the hire of a hall——

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator be a little more specific? Who has retained any percentage of any employé's salary?

Mr. BECK. Well, I do not care about giving the names; but when the investigation is had, officers of the Government——

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator state here—I do not ask him the name—that he knows that any official of this Government has retained a percentage of the salary of an employé for political purposes?

Mr. BECK. Yes, I do, and the Finance Committee all know it, and plenty of others know it.

Mr. DAWES. Then the Senator, I suggest, should have called for the information and laid it before the public in some way.

Mr. BECK. Well, it will be laid before this committee, I hope, when this bill comes up.

Mr. DAWES. I will join the Senator in that. I only want to know the fact. I am not disputing the fact by this inquiry. I only want to know if the Senator has specific information which he will lay before a committee of this body, that any official of this Government is detaining a percentage of the salary of an employé for political uses? If he has, I hope he will see to it that that individual is arraigned before the proper tribunal and impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors.

Mr. HAWLEY. Under existing law?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, under existing law.

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BECK. Certainly; I desire the Senator from North Carolina to get his hand in.

Mr. VANCE. That fact has already been officially proven by a number of witnesses before a committee of the Senate and is now to be found in the printed documents.

Mr. DAWES. Under existing law?

Mr. VANCE. No, sir; not since the passage of the civil-service bill; but one month's salary of all the Revenue Department officers in a certain district was retained in the office of the collector and blank checks sent around by the deputy for the officers to sign and the money was kept in the office of the collector.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have no doubt that there have been such infamous abuses. By reason of them the public sentiment of the country demanded the law we passed last winter. In deprecating any action here of the kind proposed I am only speaking on the broad proposition that no man in the service of the Government in any grade shall give anything toward political purposes.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I believe I have developed substantially what I desired, that there are such cases; and if we intend to stop the abuse we must reach, not the mere clerks in these Departments, but the internal-revenue officers. There are hundreds of them in North Carolina, and in 1881 58 per cent. of all the revenue collected in that great State was used in this way.

Mr. VANCE. Fifty-eight per cent. in one district.

Mr. BECK. And of that money a large portion went for political purposes; and it is known to every man and will be proved as the Senator from Indiana says before the country that men in office do give from 5 to 10 per cent.—postmasters, their deputies and their assistants, and clerks, weighers, gaugers, deputy collectors, storekeepers, everybody in office. If they are doing that voluntarily out of the money they draw for their services I want to know it, and I hope the Committee on Appropriations of both bodies will cut down their wages 10 per cent. if they admit they are getting 10 per cent. or 12½ per cent. more than they need for their services and that they can voluntarily take that money and give it away to aid one political party over another. We can at least reduce them to the extent of keeping the 10 per cent. they are voluntarily contributing in the Treasury of the United States, instead of having it go the way it does now. That we can remedy; but when we do go to cut them down 10 per cent. ninety-nine out of every hundred of those who have had to pay the 10 per cent. will show that they did it as the only means they had of holding their places not only here but everywhere else. An investigation of that will do no harm.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I have practiced law many years, and whenever I had a case on trial and the justice announced before he went to trial that he intended to decide against my client I took occasion then to take the case from him; and whenever I encounter a jury and a juror swears that he has made up his mind I always challenge him peremptorily, especially if I think his mind is made up against my client. For these reasons I am unwilling to let the Senator from Connecticut take this bill. He is chairman of the committee to which he asks that the bill be referred.

Mr. HAWLEY. I did not ask it; I beg pardon. I said it naturally went there, but I have no objection to its going anywhere else.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then the Senator does not ask that it go to his committee?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not care.

Mr. VOORHEES. Well, I do. I want it to go to a fair, unprejudiced committee. A gentleman who is so lavish in his criticism in advance of a measure I do not think a qualified juror or judge to sit in the case. Consequently I want this bill to go where it did last Congress. It went to the Judiciary Committee then, and I am willing for it to go there now.

As to the questions involved, I do not care to take up the time of the Senate any further in regard to them. I repeat, however, what I said before, that a law arming these poor clerks with an answer to the sinister presence of chairmen of State committees who come here to Washington to fill their pockets and go home with the money squeezed and coerced out of men and women would be a wise act and a beneficial act to the public service and a humane act to hard-worked employés.

As to the giving of money for political purposes, we hear too much of it. There is too much money raised for political purposes. The Senator from Connecticut puts up a plea in behalf of the sweet and precious privilege of giving money for political purposes. If gentlemen will think for a few moments, it is not much money that is needed to elicit an old-fashioned honest expression of public opinion at the polls. I have lived in a day, and so have you, Mr. President, in the Western States when elections were almost like the Gospel, which is preached without money and without price, and if we could return to those days it would be far better. There is no evil so menacing, there is no cloud so sinister and dark impending over the future of this country as this habit we have fallen into of raising enormous sums of money to surround the polls, corrupt the ballot-box, and debauch public virtue. The sooner every rivulet and stream possible can be dried up which pours money into the hands of political managers the better it will be for the future welfare and safety of this Government.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I see by the clock that we have about five minutes now until the regular order will come up. I suppose this entire debate has been out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Entirely so. It has been proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRISON. And that unanimous consent not asked for as I understand! I suggest then, Mr. President, if we are to discuss this matter in advance of a consideration of this bill by a committee, that the Senator, my colleague, let this motion for a reference lie upon the table until some of the rest of us may have an opportunity to be heard in response to the suggestions which have been made this morning.

I am not one of those who usually attempt to cross a bridge before I reach it. If this question is to have the consideration of a committee and if the suggestions which have been made as to improper influences brought to bear to collect money are to be heard by a committee upon the testimony of witnesses, the Senator, my colleague, would follow out his references to legal proceedings if he would delay the discussion until the evidence is heard. But if we are to listen to this sort of discussion in advance, then I ask that this bill may lie upon the table, and that we have the debate out in advance of a reference.

Mr. President, I should like to call attention to some transactions that did not stir my colleague's indignation, occurring at a time when the Departments here were filled with Democrats. I should like to read to him from the reports the sworn testimony of witnesses before committees of Congress showing that the very heads of bureaus and Departments in this Government, Democrats who have since become more prominent in national politics, became themselves the instrument for collecting these assessments. And, Mr. President, if I have not read the history of those times in vain, my colleague, who was then somewhat prominent in politics, never lifted his voice on the stump or in the Halls of Congress in deprecation of these practices. I agree that men grow in virtue as they grow in years, but I have greater faith in virtue when it is used to expose and denounce the evil practices of one's own party than in that virtue which lies dormant while one's own party coffers are reaping the advantage of contributions from public officers, and is only stirred into activity when the money pours into the coffers of the adverse party.

I have once before declared myself upon this question, Mr. President. I say for one I will never consent to vote for any law which deprives the members of Congress, which deprives any public officer, however humble, of the privilege of converting any part that he may choose of his salary to legitimate campaign expenses. I say any high-minded American citizen who believes in the principles of his party, not simply for the personal aggrandizement which he may get out of them, but believes in them as the true fundamental principles of government, promotive of the best interests of the whole people—I say no high-minded man would hold a public office that deprived him, as one condition of the holding, of the right to give for the legitimate purpose and impressing upon the people those principles in which he believed. I should regard myself as little better than a slave if as an American citizen I believed, let me say for illustration, in the doctrine of protection, in which my colleague also takes an interest, and was the head of a bureau here, receiving a salary of $3,000 a year, and was not allowed to contribute to the purchase of documents or the distribution of speeches that were calculated to impress upon the public mind the views I held. I should regard myself as enslaved, and I think the Senator himself would. Does he mean to put manacles upon himself? Does he mean to say that in a campaign in which the question of his return to this body shall be involved as well as the general principles of his party he shall be restrained from contributing one dollar to his campaign?

Mr. President, if the Senator is not to put himself under this restraint, why should he wish to put another man? For one I will go as far as any man to emancipate every employé of this Government from any sort of undue influence or official influence over him with reference to his contribution, but I will not undertake by a law that professes to be a charter of emancipation to put shackles upon his wrist.

Sir, I had not intended to discuss this question at all. I am willing to meet the Senator and all his suggestions about chairmen of State central committees assuming improper relations when we shall have the facts before the Senate and any bill which the committee may choose to report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLISON in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday. This bill goes over.

Mr. VOORHEES. I want my bill referred, Mr. President. I ask that it be referred. Will a single objection keep it from being referred?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not make any objection. I only made the suggestion that if the debate were to precede the investigation the bill should lie on the table.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask that the bill be referred, and the debate may take care of itself.

Mr. HARRISON. It has this morning, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock arrived pending the debate on the question of reference, and of course the matter goes over until to-morrow.

Mr. VOORHEES. If there is no objection, though, the bill may be referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Undoubtedly. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the bill introduced by him shall be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is so referred. The unfinished business of yesterday is Senate bill No. 491.

JOHN ARMFIELD.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 491) for the relief of John W. Franklin, executor of the last will of John Armfield, deceased.

Mr. MORRILL. The unfinished business, I understand, will not take any time, as the Senator from Michigan does not propose further to debate it, and if it can be at once disposed of I do not propose to interfere with it by calling for the special order.

Mr. HARRIS. It is the unfinished business and has the right of way anyway. I hope it will take but a moment to dispose of the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is Senate bill No. 491, for the relief of John W. Franklin, executor of the last will of John Armfield.

Mr. CONGER. Since my remarks yesterday on the bill now pending before the Senate I have procured the report of the committee, and have read it very carefully. I find that in one or two important particulars I labored under a misapprehension in regard to some of the facts connected with the case. From that examination I desire to say that while I think this borders closely perhaps upon bills to which I have some objection, yet I am satisfied that it comes within the rule which former committees have adopted, and which the Senate and the House have adopted as a rule in regard to this class of war claims. I feel it my duty, therefore, after the examination and after the remarks I made yesterday, to say that my views to some extent have changed, and I make no further opposition to the passage of the bill. I desire, however, with the leave of the committee and the gentleman reporting the bill, to propose an amendment which I think should be added to the bill, and to which I presume there will be no objection. I take this opportunity to propose the amendment for information. It is to add at the close of the bill the following words:

And such payment shall be in full of all claims from any source upon the Government for repayment of said moneys.

Mr. JACKSON. There is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. None whatever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, which will be read at the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill—

And such payment shall be in full of all claims from any source upon the Government for repayment of said moneys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled joint resolutions:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 24) authorizing the printing of 2,500 copies of the report of the health officer of the District of Columbia.

CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY BUILDING.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair now lays before the Senate the special order for to-day, being the bill (S. 1139) authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I should be well content that the bill should pass as rapidly as possible, and without debate, but I am also aware that although it is not within the parliamentary rule that the debate or proceedings of one House of Congress can be in any degree cited in the other House to influence its action, yet at the same time I am aware that practically for a bill of this kind to be passed sub silentio, with no reasons whatever stated for it, would be a possible cause of suspicion in the minds of those who are to pass upon it elsewhere.

It has only been very lately that I have been assigned to duty upon the special committee charged with this library question, but although that is the fact, none the less is it true that my great interest in this subject has led me very carefully to follow the debates, sometimes to participate in them, and to read with great interest the report and the elaboration with which chiefly my friend from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] has favored the Senate, and which has resulted in this bill, which passed the Senate, I think, in 1880 almost in its exact words, and which introduced again by him at the present session as the chairman of the committee is now reported back by my honorable friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] receiving the sanction of his experience, of his approval, and I may add the unanimous approval of the committee who have been charged with the consideration of this subject.

There is one point in regard to which I think there is no difference of opinion, upon which all voices are in accord, and that is the absolute and immediate necessity for an enlargement of the library accommodation. A library building fit and proper for the national Library of the American people is to-day an absolute necessity. In regard to that there is no difference on any side or in any direction that I have yet been able to discover.

The condition of the literary property of the American people, the books and manuscripts many of which if lost could never be replaced, is to-day most lamentable. It is a crying evil, it is absolutely scandalous, that such literary treasures as are the property of the American people should be in the condition that they now are, for which condition the Congress of the United States is answerable to the people of this country as the custodians of the legislative power that enables them and which demands from them the exercise of powers to place these books in safety and to give to the historical literature of the country, to the books of the country, to the recorded science, wisdom, wit, and learning of the country, a safe and proper place of bestowal.

There are other questions in regard to which there are wide differences. It is as to the locality which shall be chosen for this extensive and necessary building. There is a scheme which has been suggested from highly respectable and eminent quarters to enlarge the present Capitol building and to continue its uses for the purposes of legislation and ingraft upon it more extensive library accommodations. That has been the subject of very careful investigation. Committees of this body have more than once examined it, architectural experts have examined it, bibliophilists have been heard upon it, librarians have been consulted, and I may state as a result that the great preponderance of opinion, and so far as architects are concerned the unanimous voice of all we have been able to reach, has been in favor of a separate building for the Library and to abandon the idea of alteration. [Here Mr. BAYARD was interrupted by a message from the House of Representatives.] I say the question of the alteration of the Capitol building in order to procure more extensive accommodation for the Library has been the subject of frequent and careful consideration by committees both of architectural experts and the members of this body and the weight of authority upon that subject is very strongly against the suggestion. The proposition of enlarging and altering the Capitol is well answered I think by the architect Mr. Smithmeyer at page 15 of his report. He says:

Experience has conclusively shown that any important structure erected for a specific purpose can rarely ever be so altered or extended as to subserve any other but its original purpose; and further, that a limited space can seldom be capacious enough for one institution of rapid growth and never for two establishments of this tendency, as sooner or later they will and must conflict with each other, to the injury of one, if not of both. These rules apply with particular force to the pending question of a combined extension of the present Capitol for the better accommodation of Congress as well as the Library, and there being no doubt which, if either one, should give way for the benefit of the other, the undersigned respectfully expresses his conviction that nothing but a speedy separation of the Library from the Capitol premises and the early erection of a special edifice for it can radically overcome the existing disadvantages for Congress, and the difficulties of the Librarian, as well as the Architect, in providing against any recurrence of similar evils.

Enlargements of the Library within the present precincts of the Capitol are simply impossible without encroaching upon the capacity of the Congressional accommodations, which even now are scarcely sufficient for present and much less for future demands, and Congress has an undoubted right of priority in possession and an indisputable claim of superiority in importance over all possible aspirations of the Library.

I believe it would be the common sense and experience of most men that the alteration of any building from its original design and its arrangement for a different purpose was never wholly successful, was always more expensive, and generally was found in the end to be a mistake. I believe such would be the case if we attempted to continue our present use of the Capitol building, and at the same time to tear out the east and west fronts and throw the main walls of the Capitol forward in those directions, continuing at the same time the pretense of using the Library as a library or conducting our labors as legislators in either wing of the Capitol. I think it would prove a very costly, ridiculous, and highly inconvenient mistake. I think it would interfere seriously with the prosecution of public business in every direction, hurtful to the Library, and still more injurious to the progress of legislative business.

I am loath I will not say to take the time of the Senate, for there are so few Senators present. While I am anxious that the bill should come to a vote I am somewhat in doubt as to whether if it is passed without any discussion here it will be met favorably in the other House. At the same time I am very desirous that it should pass, and I am not disposed to fatigue myself or the few Senators who are in the Chamber by any further discussion upon it.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator will go on. ["Go on!"]

Mr. BAYARD. Four years ago the present bill was before the Senate. It was then sharply antagonized. It was discussed by those strongly in opposition first as to the location selected by the committee, and which was ratified by a very decided vote of the Senate at that time, choosing the square indicated by the bill lying to the east of the Capitol as the appropriate spot. The machinery for condemning private property was criticised, scrutinized, examined more carefully than any bill of a similar kind that has come before Congress since I have been a member, and that counts back a good many years. The bill provides ample protection to private rights, and allows no opportunity whatever of danger of public wrong. The cost of this land, belonging now to private parties, is approximately ascertained to be a very little more than $500,000. It is known in advance what nearly every holder of land is willing to take, and it is provided in the bill that there shall be a limitation upon the gross amount to be paid. Looking at it therefore in every view, the right of private citizens to full compensation for their property is provided, and at the same time the public Treasury is protected against anything like jobbery or undue or excessive demand.

The question of location was long debated, as it always will be debated. There never will come a time when the seventy-six members of this body, much less the three hundred and nineteen members of the other branch, will agree unanimously upon any one site. But I regarded that question as practically and definitely settled by the vote of the Senate, and I think it was wisely settled, and obviously for this reason among others: the propinquity of the proposed building to the Capitol is entirely in the line of convenient application for all persons, members of Congress and others, who may desire access to the reading-rooms and for consultation with the books of the Library. In the next place, a library should be quiet and secluded. The noise and rattle of trade and commerce, or rather of pleasure and business, for there is very little of commerce in this city, certainly should not be allowed to break in upon the quiet and seclusion which a library should possess. That is already secured without cost, without expense, by taking the embellished, ample, and appropriate grounds that lie now between the Capitol building and the proposed site for the location of the Library.

Were we to erect such a building as I trust this is to be, one worthy of the great object for which it is designed, ground would be required not only as a site for the edifice, but ground to seclude that edifice from tumult and noise and for the exterior surroundings which all architecture needs in order to give it full expression. The grounds that lie between the Capitol of the United States and the proposed site of this Library will serve equally for the Capitol grounds and for the new Library, not adding the cost of one farthing to the outlay for the latter. There they are all ready at hand, there they are perfectly fitted as much for the Capitol as for the Library, as much for the Library as for the Capitol; and yet the cost of the land whether for the purpose of a proper curtilage to this new building or as a site for the building itself is just the same. Land costs as much for these grand public buildings no matter how you shall occupy it. Whether it shall be with trees and shrubbery, or grassy lawns, or whether you shall occupy it with stately edifices, the cost of the land for either purpose is the same. The land that we need for embellishment and for what may be called the landscape gardening appurtenant to the building is here already provided, finished, ready for enjoyment and use instantly. The Government, as is seen by these plats attached to the bill, already owns the beds of streets which it is perfectly competent for them to vacate, the area of which costs them nothing, as it is already public property.

So far as the association of this Library with the Halls of Congress, their juxtaposition, is concerned, I hold it to be most rational and proper. The architectural association of these buildings is harmonious and natural. I wish that Congress now, not waiting for the advance in prices that must soon necessarily take place in real estate here, would possess themselves of a quadrangular space entirely surrounding the present Capitol grounds, looking forward to the time when in the rapid growth of our population necessarily it will be the site of public buildings for the use of the Government, architecturally harmonious, and each adding to the advantages, the convenience, and the adornment of the other. A quadrangle so formed, with the Capitol representing one side of the square, with this grand Library now proposed representing another side, and public buildings for many other purposes that might well be mentioned and all of which are necessary, filling up the other two sides, is a plan that strikes me as entirely reasonable and feasible, and which I am very sure, although I may not live to see it accomplished, will be seen by the generation that is to follow us. It would form a group of public buildings second to none in the world.

I could wish that that condemnation of land were to take place to-day. I think it were wise should it take place to-day. I remember very well when the gentleman who preceded me in service in this body, who was my father, and who held the position of chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, told me of his desire in 1854 to secure possession of the land running entirely around the Capitol to a depth of some six or eight hundred feet beyond the present public buildings, entirely circumventing the Capitol building and grounds, when the whole could have been had for $500,000. But then as now the penny was held so close to the eye that the dollar could not be discerned; and then as now there was that conflict of opinions, that confusion of counsels, that delay, that waiting for a unanimity that never will come, which prevented action; and the result is that Congress must pay not the $500,000 but they must pay more than ten times $500,000 for that land if they seek to condemn it for public uses.

I hope from this history something may be learned, and that now when this land shall be acquired enough will be taken not only to occupy one-half of this land fronting the Capitol but that enough shall be taken for the obvious requirements of the near future and that the amplest accommodation for the next century will be secured.

The Library has doubled in ten years. There are now more than half a million volumes and one hundred and fifty thousand manuscripts, and the other uses to which this Library building under our laws is put makes it necessary for far more accommodation than a library pure and simple. The British Museum contains no such system as the registration of copyrights; it is for scientific objects and literary purposes alone. Here the library system, if I may so call it, of Congress has many additional and it seems to me oftentimes incongruous and foreign uses. The report made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] two years ago truly states:

> The fact that this Library, alone of all government libraries, is the repository of all the records of copyright, as well as of two copies of every publication thus protected, makes the necessity for a separate building for its accommodation imperative. It is by no means in the number of printed volumes alone that the accessions derived through the copyright law add to the requirement of space. There are annually received thousands of maps, charts, engravings, photographs, chromos, and other objects of art, many of which are of great size, requiring far more space than volumes of books for their proper preservation.

I may say that the British Museum, which contains I suppose the largest library, has no such registry of copyrights, but it has the benefit in its revenues, as the Librarian informs me, of the copy tax.

It is difficult to imagine what objections there can be to this prudent, wise, well-considered measure. I do not say that if the question were entirely new, if a new or another committee were to take up this subject, the diversity of taste which is never to be disputed, the consultation and employment of other architects, possibly by new thought or new suggestion, we might not select another plan of building. I scarcely can conceive the selection of any other site; but one thing is certain, we must agree upon something; and having had this matter under consideration for so many years, and having had such frequent debate upon it, and having resisted so many assaults, I trust the present measure is now about to take the form of law, in order that we shall at least see the beginning of that which we all recognize as a duty, and that is the construction of a safe, suitable, and worthy building for the preservation of the books of the American people.

Mr. President, we have a higher than mere human authority for saying "there is a time for every purpose and for every work." I hold that this is the time precisely and instantly for the commencement of this great and important national work. I can not anticipate what objections may be urged to it; I can only say that I believe no new objections will be urged other than those which have been urged before, no new suggestions other than those we have heard before; and earnestly hoping that deliberation shall now be merged in action, I express the hope that this bill may pass the Senate to-day and may soon receive the assent of the other branch of Congress and speedily become a law.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I move to strike out the first, fourth, fifth, and sixth sections of the bill. They are the sections of the bill which provide for the condemnation of private property for the purposes of a library. I do not propose now to discuss the fitness of the site. I have voted for a bill heretofore to build a library upon the site east of the Capitol. I do not propose at this time to discuss the provisions of this bill, which make no limitation upon the amount necessary to be expended for the construction of the building. The amendment which I propose at this time simply goes to the question of the condemnation of this private property. The provision of the bill is that a commission shall be organized and that they shall buy for the purpose of the location of the Library certain property which is delineated in a plat accompanying the bill. If I understand it, it is that the commission shall first seek to purchase the property which lies between B street north and East Capitol street upon certain terms, that is to say, they shall not pay more than a proportion of $550,000 for that portion of the property. If they can not buy that portion of the property, they shall then attempt to buy upon the same limitation the property which lies between East Capitol street and B street south, and if they are not able to purchase that property upon the terms prescribed in the bill, they shall then invoke the authority of the proper court in the District for the purpose of condemning that property. The fourth section does not very definitely define whether they shall condemn the whole of that square or a portion which lies to the north of East Capitol street or on the south side. That of course can be easily amended if it shall be found necessary to do so, and I make no criticism upon that.

I find that we are confronted now with the simple question whether the Government of the United States shall exercise its right of eminent domain in such a manner as to take from these holders of private property the lots which lie to the east of the public property east of the Capitol; whether for the purposes of a public library the Congress of the United States will say that the location at that particular point is so necessary to the Government of the United States that it will proclaim that the appropriation of it is for public use and will deprive the owners of the property, in spite of their will, of that property upon such terms, not as they and the United States shall fix, but as a jury shall fix.

I recognize the right of eminent domain. I recognize the power of the Government over private property. I think I know pretty well in what cases that power can be undoubtedly exercised. I think I know when it has been exercised in aid of private corporations of a semi-public character, when it has been exercised in favor of making railroads and securing the right of way, when it has been taken for the purpose of public streets in a city, when it has been taken for various uses that are called public; but I deny that there is a fair, legitimate, constitutional authority when you take private property merely that you may locate a library upon a site that is more convenient or more agreeable or more in accordance with an æsthetic taste in laying out our public grounds and buildings.

Here is a bill which I think is an illustration of the distinction that I desire to make. Private property must yield to public uses. Those public uses must be uses of necessity; there must be a necessity for taking the property before it can be fairly said that it is a public use to which it is to be applied.

Is it necessary to take this property? You have property here by this very plat which lies all around the Capitol upon which the Library can be built. You have public property lying to the north and to the south of the Capitol, you have areas and squares all over the city, a portion of one of which has been appropriated recently to the building of a Pension Office, where it was at one time contended that the public Library should be located. I remember very well a debate in the Senate when there were most strenuous advocates of the propriety of locating the public Library in that large and beautiful square. I did not think so.

Mr. MORRILL. It obtained but seven votes.

Mr. PENDLETON. It may have obtained only seven votes, and I was not one of those who voted for it. I am prepared to say now as I said then, that I think the Capitol building is the proper location for the Library. I would prefer to have it here. I would prefer to have it in proximity to the Capitol. It being a Congressional Library, for the uses of the members of Congress primarily, I should like to have it in a convenient locality for the use of the members of Congress.

That is not the point I make. I have no controversy with my honorable friend from Delaware, who says that he would like to have all this property, or a great deal of it, to the east, to the south, and to the north of the Capitol, within public control. I heartily join with him there. I wish the suggestion of his father had been carried out in the early days and the property had been bought. I am willing to-day to make an appropriation to buy the property which shall be thought to be necessary either for the Library or for any other public use; but in order to gratify an æsthetic taste, to gratify a suggestion that it will be more beautiful hereafter, I am not willing to take away from these people against their will their private property upon the terms that we or a jury may prescribe.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say that it will be much in accordance with the will of seven-eighths of the property-owners, and I do not know but I might include the whole of them, for I think almost all of the holders of property on the east side of the Capitol have already signified their desire and anxiety that Congress should take this ground. If the Senator will allow me another word——

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. He talks about it not being proper for us to take this ground for a public use. I will say to the Senator that we took two squares, one on the south and one on the north side, at a much larger expense than will be required for ground for the Library, simply for the enlargement of the public grounds in front of the Capitol. If that was justifiable, it seems to me it is far more justifiable and a much greater necessity that we shall have a site for the Library than for the enlargement of the public grounds in front of the Capitol.

Mr. PENDLETON. In relation to the first suggestion of my honorable friend from Vermont, that seven-eighths of those people are willing to sell their property to the Government for the purposes of the Library, that only shows that you will have the less difficulty in dealing with them and purchasing at fair prices the property that you want; but it has never entered into my conception of the duty or the powers of the Government that if there is a single man, woman, or child in that locality within the limits of the property that you desire to take who resists your application upon terms that they are willing to accept, therefore you shall take the property against their will. To me the argument is as strong if one-eighth remain who decline to sell as if none of all the property-owners was willing to enter into a contract with us.

Mr. BUTLER. Will my friend pardon me for interrupting him a moment?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. The bill distinctly provides for the purchase of the property. It is only in the alternative that condemnation is to take place.

Mr. PENDLETON. It does provide for the purchase of the property, and it provides that you may deal with anybody you can in relation to the property; but suppose a gentleman owns property there who does not wish to sell it. If every man resists, you have no more right to take the property than you have to take it if only one man resists.

Mr. BUTLER. If my honorable friend will pardon me, he does not surely doubt the power of the Government to take this property for public uses. Shall I understand the Senator to say that he doubts that?

Mr. PENDLETON. I do not doubt the power of the Government to take any private property for public use upon making proper compensation, and that compensation is, according to the provisions of this bill, to be determined by the court and a jury. But I may differ with the honorable Senator as to what is a public use. I say a public use is that which necessity requires you to take, not which whim, not which caprice, not which desire to make a beautiful ground will justify you in taking. I say that the public use which justifies the taking of private property must be that public use which is a necessity for the Government. I do not mean to say that it must be a necessity for its life exactly; I do not know that I should be willing to press it that far; but I say that when you have a beautiful site for a library upon one square of ground you can not take the adjoining square because a majority of Congress thinks it would be the better location. I say that you have no right to gratify your taste at the expense of private property. I say in answer further to the honorable Senator from Vermont that if there is a single person resisting, the obstacle to the Government is just as formidable, is just as great, as if every man who owns property there were resisting.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator pardon me again?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. There is hardly a bill reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that does not provide for the taking of land for a site, and I certainly should be the last to ever charge the Senator from Ohio with, I will not say the bad taste, but with the idea of placing a library building in front of the Capitol on the ground that we now have.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have been too long under the instruction of my worthy friend in relation to the Library and various other embellishments and adornments of the Capitol and the city to be willing to submit to a criticism that my taste is impaired in this matter. I am willing to follow him perfectly as to the proper location of the Library, I mean in the sense of its being beautiful and convenient; but I can not, according to my judgment, follow him in the idea that because he or the honorable gentleman who sits beside him [Mr. BUTLER] or the members of the Library Committee think that is the proper place for the Library building, therefore you can sacrifice private property to put it there.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I would ask my honorable friend how we are ever to get a location upon which to place the Library?

Mr. PENDLETON. We have locations all over the city. We have squares everywhere.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. PENDLETON. The Treasury of the United States is abundant. Go to these people, if that be the proper place for the Library, and deal with them as you would be obliged to deal with them if you wanted to buy a house or establish a public institution there. Put the Government of the United States upon a par with the citizens in relation to a question of this sort, and let them deal as man to man as to the price of their property. I did not mean not to yield to the Senator from South Carolina, for he knows I will do that with great pleasure.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no further remark to make on that point.

Mr. PENDLETON. The question with me is simply, is this a public use for which we are justified in taking private property? It might be very proper to establish institutions by Congress all over this city and to appropriate them in one sense to public use, as the Library is in one sense a public use; but I maintain (and I am sorry to differ from so many of my friends on the subject) that when you come to take private property for the uses for the Government there must be a stronger necessity than that merely it is the location which commends itself to the taste and to the convenience of this age or this day or these members of Congress.

There are many decisions on this subject. I do not choose to go very closely into the legal bearing of this question. The Senators who are around me and have had some experience in that way will know that it has been contended, and contended successfully, in many courts that you can not condemn private property for the uses of a depot for a railroad, because, say the courts, the depot may be located in one square or another square without injury to the public service for which the railroad is built; but that you may take a right of way through a man's farm, because you can not consistently with the purposes and uses of a railroad go all around it and around the farm of every man who does not wish the railroad to pass through his land.

We need the Library building. I am willing to vote liberal appropriations for the Library. My judgment is that a portion of the grounds in the eastern part of the city beyond the Capitol is the best place for it; I admit all that; but I desire to submit to Senators the question, whether agreeing to that idea, whether believing that that is the best place as to convenience and taste for the location of the Library, we are at liberty to take the private property of citizens to gratify our notions as to the beauty or the tastefulness of the location? If it be true that seven-eighths of those people want to sell, then confine the powers given to the commission to purchase from them, but if there is a single man there who is unwilling to dispose of his property upon the terms which the commission will offer to him, I say protect his right as absolutely and as perfectly as if no single man in all the range of that property was willing to come to terms with the commission.

Mr. McPHERSON. Suppose the other eighth refuse to sell at all?

Mr. PENDLETON. Then, according to the provisions of the bill, you must condemn.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator cites the case, suppose seven-eighths are willing to sell at a price that the commission would think a reasonable price and agree to give up the property and the other eighth refuse to sell at all, you would certainly be prevented by that cause from locating the Library there at all.

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly, and I believe in the power and the right of any citizen who occupies and owns property there to prevent the location of the Library unless he receives the amount which he thinks he ought to sell his property for.

Mr. President, I do not care to go further in the discussion of this single question connected with the bill. I have felt it to be incumbent upon me to make this statement to the Senate in order to call attention to the fundamental idea, is this a public use which justifies the confiscation of private property? Is the fact that this is the best place for the Library, according to the judgment, the convenience, and the taste of members, a sufficient reason for depriving the owner of the property of his common-law rights which are guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States? For one I do not think so. Therefore I shall vote for my amendment, and I shall not vote for the bill unless the amendment prevails.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. For my own satisfaction I should like to know how this limit of $500,000 comes to be put into the bill, because it is upon that limit that the right of condemnation seems to turn. There is a great deal of force in what was said by the Senator from Ohio, that the right of condemnation is one that ought to be exercised always with great tenderness, because if there is anything to which the American mind is more sensibly attached than another it is the sacred right of property.

While we all admit that occasion may arise, and frequently arises, when the power of Government should be exercised and property appropriated against the will of the owner, it ought not to be done in a loose way. I confess that I have no means of knowing whether the limitation of $500,000 upon this property is right or wrong. I do not know how the committee got at that outside of a commission who had authority to inquire into the fact. Surely the Committee on the Library did not go outside of the mere matter of originating a bill, and I should like to know what data, if any, have been furnished to the committee upon which they fix this limit of $500,000, the refusal of which shall give to the Government the right to go into its own court and take the property of the citizen and get him out of the way. This may be a reasonable sum or it may not be. It occurs to me that before that limit was reached some reasonable means at least ought to have been employed to see whether it was right or wrong.

Mr. MORRILL. I presume the Senator from Florida did not listen to what I said a few days ago.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I did not have that pleasure.

Mr. MORRILL. I said that nearly all the parties interested in all these squares east of the Capitol have signed a written contract in which they offer to sell to the Government at certain prices the property which they hold, and it was based therefore on that estimate that the whole would not exceed $550,000.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Upon the valuation put by the owners upon their own property?

Mr. MORRILL. Upon the valuation of the owners, which is, I am informed, above the appraised value of what they own as it stands on the tax-books of the city.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That may be.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I do not rise to submit any suggestions in regard to the merits of this bill. I suppose it is admitted upon all sides that the time has come when there should be additional accommodations for the Library. I rose to address myself particularly to the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to strike out certain portions of the bill and the suggestions which he has made in regard to the law of the case. I think he is entirely mistaken in regard to the law. His objection to the bill is that while provision is made for the purchase of this ground if it can be done, provision is also made for condemning portions of it provided the owners and occupants will not sell at reasonable prices to the Government and that such provision is unconstitutional. I submit that if he is correct the United States would have to go forever without a site for a library building, unless we should build it upon ground already owned by the Government, because if the objection holds to the taking of the property which is now intended as a site for the Library building on the ground that it is not constitutional to condemn it, the same objection might be raised wherever the site of the building might be selected; the owners of that property might say with equal propriety that some other property might be had. The same objection could be raised to a proposition to take any ground in the city now owned by private parties that could be raised by the owners and occupants of the proposed site.

I understand it to be admitted by the Senator that in taking this ground for a site for the Library we are taking it for a public use, and in order to show that he is incorrect in regard to the law I propose to read briefly from a standard work upon the subject of eminent domain. Mills on Eminent Domain in section 11 collates the decisions upon this question. He says:

> The propriety or policy of the condemnation not a judicial question. If the use is certainly a public one—

And such I understand it is admitted is the use to which this ground is to be put—

> then the legislative authority over the subject can not be restrained or supervised by the courts. Only when it is plainly perceived that there is an attempt to evade the law and procure the condemnation of property for a private use, or to accomplish an end not public in its character, will the courts declare the act void; or if it was doubtful or questionable whether the use was public or not, testimony might be admissible to determine the fact. The Legislature is the proper body to determine the necessity of the exercise of the power and the extent to which the exercise shall be carried, and there is no restraint upon the power save that requiring that compensation shall be made. As soon as the court has arrived at the conclusion that the use is public, then the judicial function is gone, and there is no restraint on the legislative discretion. The degree of public usefulness need not be determined by the court, or whether the proposed plan will accomplish the end desired. Statutes palpably improvident and hasty must still be sustained by the courts.

I understand that to be the law on this subject, and why there should be any more hardship in the present case in requiring parties who will not agree with the commission to be appointed under the bill to go to the courts and have the value of their property which is to be taken for this public use determined than there would be in case it was attempted by the municipal authorities to run a street through the property or to take a portion of it for a public square I can not imagine. Those things are of every-day occurrence. Under the general laws of the several States for laying out highways they are run wherever the commissions or viewers locate them, with only the restriction in certain States that they shall not be run through a garden or through a dwelling-house. The laws of Congress and the laws of the several States give railroad corporations, upon the theory that they are quasi public corporations, that the use to which the property is to be put is a public one, the right to locate their railroad lines where they choose within the limits of their charters, and they run their lines through dwelling-houses and other improvements. The courts have never undertaken to restrain their right to locate their lines at discretion where they suppose it will be for the best interest of the company.

As I understand it, under the authority of the charters for railroad companies granted by Congress and by the several States, depot grounds may be condemned and are condemned, and this is a matter of daily occurrence, and the question can not be raised as a defense to the action for condemnation of such property that some other property might have been taken the taking of which would do less injury to individual owners. It is not an uncommon occurrence where people have gone into the suburbs of a city and bought a tract of land, laid it out in beautiful grounds, improved it and erected magnificent buildings upon it, that afterward as the city improves and grows it becomes necessary to lay out streets and highways through those grounds, and the owner is compelled to submit to the appropriation, and if he can not agree with the public authorities as to the price for the land taken he is required to go to the courts and submit the matter to a jury and let them assess the damages.

It seems to me it can not be that the United States in selecting a site for a library is required to consult the private owners of lands in the city of Washington, in the national capital, to find a place where it can purchase the grounds and deal amicably with all the different owners of the tract desired. I say that such a rule would prevent the construction of a library building unless you could find a site already owned by the United States. I think the Senator from Ohio is entirely wrong in regard to the law in the case.

Mr. PENDLETON. I recognize the truth of most that the gentleman has said in relation to the law on this subject; but I deny entirely that the judgment of the Legislature is absolutely and beyond all controversy the test as to whether the use to which the property is to be put is a public use that justifies its condemnation. I did not hear the authority from which the gentleman read, although I heard the citation itself.

Mr. DOLPH. I will send the Senator the book. I read the eleventh section of Mills on Eminent Domain.

Mr. PENDLETON. Now, I will read to him pretty good authority, as it has been generally recognized among the lawyers and courts of the United States, and that is nothing less than Chancellor Kent, for in the second volume of his Commentaries he says:

> It undoubtedly must rest, as a general rule, in the wisdom of the Legislature to determine when public uses require the assumption of private property; but if they should take it for a purpose not of a public nature, as if the Legislature should take the property of A and give it to B, or if they should vacate a grant of property or of a franchise, under the pretext of some public use or service, such cases would be gross abuses of their discretion and fraudulent attacks on private right, and the law would be clearly unconstitutional and void. Real property, and the rights and privileges of private corporate bodies, are all held by grant or charter from Government, and it would be a violation of contract and repugnant to the Constitution of the United States to interfere with private property, except under the limitations which have been mentioned.

I think the Senator from Oregon will not contest the authority of the learned commentator whose words I have read; and he does not reduce the question to a comparison of ideas among the legislators themselves as to what is a fair exercise of this right of eminent domain; and I say that it is not a fair exercise of the right; it is not a case which justifies the exertion of the power of confiscating private property. We own all around this city squares and lots of land sufficient in every respect for the Library, and many of them so entirely appropriate for that purpose that it took the Senate days and weeks of discussion, as men who were here at that time know, to determine whether they were the proper site or not. In this condition of things, I say it is not a fair exercise of the right of eminent domain and confiscation of private property to declare that the Library shall be located upon a particular hundred feet of property and not upon the adjoining hundred feet. I say if this is the proper place for locating your Library, buy the land. If seven-eighths of the owners are anxious to sell the land, they will sell it at a fair price; if seven-eighths of them combine to sell it, the one-eighth will undoubtedly sell for something like a fair price; but if that one-eighth will not sell, and the only justification for taking this property is that you think it a more beautiful or appropriate place for a library than any other of the acres and acres you own in the vicinage of this Capitol, then I say that you have no right to take it any more than you have to confiscate the simplest right of the humblest individual in the country.

I am not contesting whether this is the proper site for the Library; I am not saying whether these people seek to extort money or not. I know nothing about that. I am willing to concede that this is the appropriate place; I am willing to sit at the feet of the Senator from Vermont, who has given to this subject so much attention, and who has doubtless exercised a wise and discriminating judgment in selecting this place for the Library; I am willing for the purpose of what I am now saying to agree to everything that has been claimed in behalf of this Library and the necessity of erecting a commodious building for the books that we have; but I maintain now—I have mentioned it before and if I remain of the same opinion I shall contend hereafter—that merely to gratify your taste for the beautiful and the appropriate you shall not take the private property of the citizen of this country. I do not think it right. I can not bring my judgment to the conclusion that that is a fair exercise of the powers which you hold over individuals in the enjoyment of the property that they have bought or earned, hold, and now enjoy. Go into the market and buy their property if they are willing to sell, and if they are not willing to sell, take some of the other numerous lots that you have around here, even if they be not so entirely appropriate, rather than confiscate private property to gratify your taste for the beautiful.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, far be it from me to criticise the opinion of the eminent chancellor which has been read to the Senate. I do not do it; it is sound law. It is, as I understand it, that the legislative power could not, under the plea that it was necessary to take private property for public use, take private property for private use. But as I understand the Senator, when he first addressed himself to the Senate upon this question he admitted that this Congressional Library was a public library, and that the taking of ground for a site for it was a taking of ground for public uses. That being so, I still maintain that the quotation which I read shows that the courts have uniformly decided that if the ground is to be taken for public use the degree of the necessity for that public use can not be questioned by the courts; that the Legislature is the sole judge, and though the act may be improvidently drawn, still the courts will enforce the act, the necessity of the taking not being a judicial question but a legislative question. At the time the author read by the Senator wrote the law of corporations and of eminent domain was in its infancy, and there have been great advances made in regard to that law since that time. As I said before, it is not necessary to question the doctrine laid down by Chancellor Kent; it does not apply to this case. It being admitted that the use for which this property is sought to be taken is a public use, the degree of necessity is for Congress and not for the courts, and I can not conceive why it is any more a hardship for the owner of this ground to go to the courts for compensation for lands, if they can not agree with this commission, than it would be for the poorest colored man in this city who owns a tract of ground to go to the courts to have the compensation determined which must be paid to him by this municipality when it undertakes to lay out a street through his lot.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. PENDLETON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment be reported.

Mr. PENDLETON. It is to strike out the sections which relate to condemnation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the amendment is called for.

Mr. HARRIS. It is a very long one and need not be read. It has been stated.

Mr. MORRILL. I will merely say that striking out those sections of course destroys the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, as the yeas and nays are to be taken, I desire to say that while I think the selection that is made of a site in this bill is probably the worst that could have been made, yet I am unable to see the force of the objection urged by the Senator from Ohio.

It is evident to me that this is a public use, and that to adopt any other principle would be practically to deny to the Government of the United States the opportunity for acquiring sites and locations for public structures, not only here but in every State in the Union; and entertaining that view of the legal question involved, although I do not concur at all in the views that are incorporated in their bill, I shall be compelled to vote against the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). Upon this bill I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. The Senator from Maine is paired upon political questions with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN]; but as it is understood that the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Maine agree in respect to this bill, I consented to pair with the Senator from Maine upon questions pertaining to this bill. If I were not paired I should vote "yea," because I am opposed to the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] is paired with my colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] on this bill. The Senator from Georgia, if present, would vote in favor of it, and my colleague would vote against it.

Mr. BECK (when Mr. HOAR'S name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] on all questions pertaining to this bill. I do not know how he would vote on this amendment.

Mr. MORRILL (when the name of Mr. JONAS was called). The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. VAN WYCK (when his name was called). On all questions relating to this bill and its amendments I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON]. He is in favor of the bill, and I am opposed to it.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMDEN. I desire to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. KENNA] with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

The result was announced—yeas 3, nays 37; as follows:

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If he were present, I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

Mr. COLQUITT (when Mr. BROWN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. BROWN] is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MORRILL (when the name of Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, was called). The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

Mr. COCKRELL (when his name was called). Some Senator spoke to me yesterday, I believe, about pairing with him, as well as I recollect, on this bill, but I can not recall it unless it was the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. Has the Senator from Vermont a memorandum of that?

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] on this question, I am told. I should vote "nay," and he would vote "yea" if he were here.

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I am paired on the passage of this bill with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). On the passage of this bill I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay" and he would vote for the bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK (when his name was called). In addition to the announcement made by the Senator from Vermont of the pair of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] and myself, I desire to add that Mr. CAMERON is in favor of this bill and I am opposed to it.

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], and therefore shall not vote. I do not know how he would vote on this bill.

COLUMBUS F. PERRY AND ELIZABETH H. GILMER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first bill on the Calendar of General Orders is now in order.

The bill (S. 767) for the relief of Columbus F. Perry and Elizabeth H. Gilmer was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that Mrs. Elizabeth H. Gilmer, of La Fayette County, Alabama, on the 18th of June, 1866, conveyed to Columbus F. Perry, her adopted son, a certain plantation in Montgomery County by a deed of gift, which plantation was by Perry reconveyed October 2, 1866, to Mrs. Gilmer, without his having in any way exercised any acts of ownership thereon or received any of the profits thereof; that the collector of internal revenue of the second district of Alabama collected $4,440 from Gilmer and Perry as internal-revenue tax on succession, claiming that a succession tax of $2,220 was due the United States for and on account of each of these deeds of conveyance; and that the collection of the tax as to $3,000 thereof is clearly unjust, and the amount thus paid should be refunded. The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Columbus F. Perry and Elizabeth H. Gilmer $3,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case. I believe it is a short one.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. JACKSON January 16:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 767) for the relief of Columbus F. Perry and Elizabeth H. Gilmer, have considered the same, and respectfully report as follows:

This claim under a bill similar to the present was before the committee for investigation at the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, was then fully considered, and a favorable report made thereon. Said report (No. 573) correctly sets forth the facts, and your committee, after re-examination of the case, adopt said report as follows:

Mr. PUGH, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following report, to accompany bill S. 956:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 956) for the relief of Columbus F. Perry and Elizabeth H. Gilmer, of La Fayette, Chambers County, Alabama, having considered the same, beg leave to make the following report:

Mrs. Elizabeth H. Gilmer, on the 18th day of June, 1866, made a deed of gift for a tract of land in Montgomery County, Alabama, containing 3,000 acres, more or less, to her adopted son, Columbus F. Perry. Mrs. Gilmer was sixty-eight years old, and had no children, but did have nieces and nephews, and after the making of the deed became known to them, and before Perry went into possession of the land, or received any benefit from it, or exercised any acts of ownership over it, the nieces and nephews were so offended at the execution of the deed that they threatened resistance and litigation as heirs at law of Mrs. Gilmer should she die without a will, and the making of the deed created such a state of feeling in the family that Perry determined not to accept the gift; and the committee find that in fact the gift never was accepted, and the intention of the parties as expressed in the deed never was in fact carried into execution; and that the reconveyance by Perry to Mrs. Gilmer was made within three months of the date of the first deed, and was executed on the advice of their attorney that it would be best to reconvey to avoid any trouble about the paper title.

On this state of facts the internal-revenue officers of the second district of Alabama, where the land was located, assessed a succession tax of $2,220 on each conveyance, which the claimants were required to pay and did pay to the revenue collector under protest. Fourteen hundred and forty dollars of the $4,440 was returned to the claimants as an excess in the assessment, and the claim is for the balance, $3,000.

Your committee are satisfied from the evidence and the law that it was an unauthorized assessment, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill without the preamble.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the preamble. The committee report an amendment to strike out the preamble. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

STATE NATIONAL BANK OF LOUISIANA.

The bill (S. 339) for the relief of the State National Bank of Louisiana was considered as in the Committee of the Whole. The claim of the State National Bank of Louisiana for the payment of cotton belonging to the bank taken by the agents of the Treasury Department of the United States in the States of Louisiana and Arkansas after the 30th of June, 1865, is by the bill referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication. The bank may institute suit in that court, which shall be tried and adjudicated as if the action had been filed within the time authorized by law; the testimony and original papers filed by the bank before the Treasury Department in connection with the claim are to be received by the court as evidence as if taken or filed under the rules of the court; and the bank and the United States may take further evidence, as may be deemed proper, subject to the rules for taking testimony in the court.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear the report read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. JACKSON January 16:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 339) for the relief of the State National Bank, Louisiana, have considered the same, and respectfully report as follows:

This claim was favorably reported upon by the committee at the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress. That report (No. 393) correctly states the facts of the case and the legal questions involved, and your committee again adopt said report and the recommendations thereof, as follows:

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following report, to accompany bill S. 1647:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred "A bill for the relief of the State National Bank of Louisiana," having examined the same, make the following report:

That the State Bank of Louisiana, a banking corporation chartered by the laws of Louisiana, and located at the city of New Orleans, in 1863, while said city was in the permanent occupation and control of military forces of the United States, through its agents contracted with various parties residing in upper Louisiana and Arkansas, who had raised and were the private owners thereof, for the purchase of several hundred bales of cotton. At the dates of these contracts of purchase the venders resided within the lines of the confederate forces, and commercial relations between the bank and themselves were prohibited both by the general and statute laws of the Government and by the proclamation of the President of the United States made under and in pursuance of said laws. The cotton thus purchased or contracted for remained in the possession of the several venders until after the 30th June, 1865, when, hostilities having ceased, it was delivered over to the agent of the bank, and by said agent collected together at different points preparatory to shipment to New Orleans.

After the cotton had thus reached the possession of the bank, and while awaiting shipment to New Orleans, special Treasury agents of the United States, on the 27th and 29th July, 1865, and the 18th November, 1865, seized the same and caused it to be shipped to Simeon Draper, the agent of the Treasury Department at New York, by whom it was sold, and the proceeds paid into the United States Treasury. The State Bank of Louisiana, after the close of the war, having been merged into the State National Bank of Louisiana, the latter, as the successor to all the rights and interests of the former bank, made claim to the proceeds of this cotton, but its claim was rejected by the Treasury Department. The bank thereafter, on the 21st September, 1877, instituted an action in the Court of Claims for the recovery of said proceeds, and was defeated in said court by the plea of the statute of limitation. The object of the present bill is to allow the bank to have its claim referred to the Court of Claims for trial and adjudication just as though the action had been filed in said court within the time authorized by law. Its claim before the Department was not finally determined until after the law of the statute had attached. The rejection of the claim by the Department was based upon the ground that its purchases having been made in 1863 from parties occupying an enemy relation, the bank failed to acquire title to the cotton, and had therefore no valid claim to its proceeds. If the case stood alone upon the contract for the purchase of the cotton in 1863 the correctness of this ruling could not be well questioned. The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in Montgomery vs. United States (15 Wallace, 395) and Mitchell vs. United States (21 Wallace) declare that such contracts of purchase would fail to confer a valid title to the property, and your committee at the present session of Congress have reported against a bill granting relief as to the proceeds of property in a case where the party, by his purchase from inhabitants of insurrectionary districts, in violation of the non-intercourse laws of the United States, failed to acquire a valid title. So that if nothing appeared in the present case except the bank's purchase of the cotton in 1863 from venders residing within the confederate lines, it could not be distinguished from the Mitchell claim, and would be controlled by the principles applied in that case.

But there are important particulars in which the present differs from the Mitchell case. The bank's contract for the purchase of the cotton was not completed in 1863 or during the period of actual war. It had paid and the venders had received the purchase money, but the cotton remained in the possession of the venders under an agreement for its future delivery. If the venders had subsequently refused to make delivery and complete the contract, and the bank had tried then, either during or after the war, to recover the cotton, it would have been nonsuited in any court of the United States if the illegality of the contract had been pleaded or if the same had appeared to the court in the course of the trial. The planters did not, however, avail themselves of the illegality of the contract, but on the contrary, recognizing the moral obligation which rested upon them after receiving the purchase money, they voluntarily completed the contract, and delivered the cotton over to the possession of the bank after the war had actually closed. Was this delivery, which appears to have been made subsequent to June 30, 1865, in contravention of law or of the non-intercourse acts and regulations of the Government? If the parties could at that time have lawfully made an original contract with each other for the sale and purchase of the cotton in question, it is difficult to see any valid reason why they could not then, without violation of law or public policy, recognize as binding and complete a contract previously entered into, no intervening rights having attached. Sunday contracts are generally prohibited or forbidden by law, but when completed on Monday by delivery their validity can not be impeached. The controlling question, therefore, in the present case is, could these parties lawfully hold commercial intercourse with each other when the cotton was delivered. or rather, was such delivery, either as an original transaction or as the consummation of a previous agreement, in violation of law?

On the 24th June, 1865, the President of the United States, by proclamation issued under authority of law, expressly ordered that "all restrictions upon internal, domestic, and coastwise intercourse and trade, and upon the purchase and removal of products" lying west of the Mississippi River (excepting those relating to property heretofore purchased by the agents or captured by or surrendered to the forces of the United States) are annulled. Under this express authority given by law the bank could legally have purchased this cotton. The venders could lawfully have sold or given it to the bank. When the venders after this proclamation delivered the cotton to the bank, it was in effect either a new sale based upon the valuable consideration previously received or a voluntary relinquishment and donation of all their rights and title to the property. But suppose it is treated as the affirmation or confirmation of the contract of purchase made in 1863, what rule of law or principle of public policy forbids the ratification of that contract after June 24, 1865, before the Government had seized or captured the cotton? As a general proposition, void, as distinguished from voidable, contracts can not be confirmed, for the reason that the same legal objections arising from positive law or public policy continue to operate when the confirmation is attempted which existed at the formation of the original contract. But when that is not the case, when the law or public policy that originally vitiates the contract has been changed, when the legal objections to such contracts have ceased to operate, there is no reason why the parties thereto may not lawfully ratify or reaffirm their agreement. If this position is correct, the act of the venders in ratifying and completing their contracts by delivery of the cotton after the restrictions upon commercial intercourse had been removed, conferred upon the bank a title to the property just as valid as though the contract had been first entered into at the date and place of delivery; so that the case is narrowed down to this, that after all hostilities had terminated and the President had, by his proclamation, removed all restrictions upon trade in the districts formally declared to be in insurrection, the bank applied to the planters, who agreed to sell it their cotton in 1863, and requested them to recognize and complete their agreement and confer upon the bank the possession and ownership of the cotton. This they might have refused to do, but feeling the moral obligation arising out of the receipt of the money the bank had paid them, they freely delivered the cotton to the agent of the bank, when it was lawful for them to hold intercourse, and before any intervening rights of the Government had attached.

Under those circumstances the transaction may well be termed either a valid confirmation of a former contract or a new sale as of the date of such delivery, or a gift. When the cotton was so received in 1865 it must be admitted that the possession which the bank thereby acquired was a legal one. The cotton had never been captured flagrante bello, it had never been abandoned nor seized as such, consequently the United States never acquired the right of seizure coupled with possession before the bank perfected both its title and possession. Whether the agents of the Treasury Department had any authority in law for seizing this cotton in the possession of the bank at the several dates already given is, in the opinion of your committee, a matter of such grave doubt, to say the least of it, as to make this a proper case for the decision of some competent judicial tribunal. What the bank now asks is that it may be permitted to sue in the Court of Claims, and that said court shall hear and adjudicate the case as though it had been instituted within six years after the seizure of the cotton by the officers of the Government. The proceeds of the cotton are in the United States Treasury, placed there by the alleged wrongful acts of special agents of that Department. The bank prosecuted its claim to these proceeds before the Department, hoping for a favorable decision, until its remedy in the Court of Claims was barred by the statute of limitations. Again, claimants in this class of cases were not supposed by the legal profession to have any remedy in the Court of Claims until the Klein case was decided in December, 1871. Under those circumstances the bank, having been guilty of no laches, should not be deprived of the opportunity to have its claim passed upon by the Court of Claims. It would certainly be against conscience for the Government in a case like the present to keep this money and deny to the bank the privilege of establishing its superior right thereto. Your committee accordingly recommend the passage by the Senate of the accompanying bill.

Mr. CONGER. This bill provides that all the testimony and original papers filed by the bank in the Treasury Department in connection with this claim "shall be received by said court as evidence as if taken and filed under the rules of said court." It makes no provision that any testimony or papers in the case taken by the United States may be used as evidence. It is faulty in that respect. It does permit the United States to take further evidence, but not to use any evidence that may have been taken in this case.

This is one of a succession of cotton claims coming to Congress year after year, and I do not know what the merits of this claim may be, but I suspect all cotton claims of that kind where the cotton in 1862, and 1863, and 1864, wherever it could be held safely, belonged to the confederate government. By its law and by its rules it was property of the government; it was the currency between the confederate government and the world, by which purchases were made and munitions of war obtained. This bank seems to have had some contract in relation to it as early as the spring of 1863. It is a matter of general history that the cotton belonging to the confederate government, claimed by it, held by it for its own use, was kept hidden away from being taken by our troops or by the officers of this Government from month to month and from year to year, and was removed from one place to another to avoid capture or to avoid confiscation.

Here is a case where some two or three years after cotton had entered into the ownership of a bank, which, if I understand aright, was the very bank in the South which held the deposits of the confederate government and managed its financial concerns, it came to light after having been hid till 1865 and until proclamations and laws had been proclaimed and made, and then the bank claimed it as its own property. I would like to have had the report state whether this State Bank of Louisiana, being the fiscal agent of the confederate government, held this property or contracted for this property as a means for paying off an indebtedness for carrying on the war on behalf of the confederacy, or in what way they undertook to become in 1863 the owners of cotton then contraband, then held by the confederate states and shipped and used as the most effective agent for carrying on the war.

The report does not say anything about that. Sir, I consider the introduction of these cotton claims, the pressing of them here, the failure to have such a claim passed upon by Congress after open discussion, and the sending them to the Court of Claims after the statute of limitation has run against them for years, opening them up anew and removing the statute of limitations, to be entirely wrong. Here in sending this case to the Court of Claims the bill declares more positively than in any other case that all papers and all evidence ex parte which has been before the Treasury Department on behalf of the claimant shall be evidence in the Court of Claims. I think it goes beyond all the ordinary rules we have adopted in the Senate. I am suspicious of this claim, and the report as I read it fails to account for the purchase of this property in any legitimate commercial way as the business of the bank. It fails to account for its secretion during all those times when our forces were commencing to occupy the territory in which the cotton was found. It remained hidden, to be developed and brought forth after peace was restored and to be claimed by those in whose hands it could not have been claimed at the time the purchase is said to have been made.

I am suspicious of such claims. During my long service in Congress there has been an array of them passing from the South to Congress, an array of cotton claims pressed upon Congress continually, and there is no question but what when they are brought in here there should be some rule adopted even in sending them to the Court of Claims; there should be some rule adopted by Congress making the inquiry positive in regard to the character of the property during the war, whether it was confederate property in fact, and let not the case turn upon the simple fact that after it had been hidden until peace came and then was found by the officers of the United States and under the law taken and seized, and therefore it should be paid for because it was seized after the proclamation of peace. This property had a character; it had a use. It was the use of cotton in the South and its transportation in blockade runners and around by Texas that gave life and vitality and force and continuance to that terrible struggle in which we were engaged.

Now, sir, I would not have those who were dealing in this property and buying it, as I believe, for the use of the confederate government come in as individuals now to reap the benefits of their purchase. I distrust all that class of claims. This cotton lay secreted in 1863 and 1864, and it comes up here now; and I am free to say that now, more forcibly even than before the war, in the Congress of the United States cotton is king. This is one out of a multitude of a great, vast army of such claims, and the report does not satisfy me as to the character and ownership of the property during the two or three years when the cotton lay concealed, moved about from one place to another to avoid capture by our forces, hidden away, under the law requiring officials of the United States to seize that kind of property, abandoned, captured, contraband property, and make it subservient to the uses of the United States.

If I ever feel called upon to vote for the passage of any law making an appropriation in money to pay for these claims, or for any law with these curious restrictions in it sending such a claim to the Court of Claims for examination, it will be when the history of that particular kind of property has been made by the committee plain and clear.

I said I was afraid of these claims. They come in all kinds of insidious shapes. Nearly two-thirds of the time of the Committee on War Claims in the other House was spent in examining and meeting and investigating and defeating the cotton claims, until, I think, throughout the United States there was a prejudice against that class of claims arising from the very nature of the claims and the presumption of fraud and wrong in pressing them that impresses every person who hears of such a claim here.

I make these remarks because this report of the committee does not give the character and history of this property, and why it lay as, if I understand the case rightly, it did from the spring of 1863 until the fall of 1865, before it was dragged to light and then claimed by the fiscal depository of the confederate funds in Louisiana.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 12, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to dispense with reading so much of the Journal as relates to the formal introduction and reference of bills.

The motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND was agreed to.

The Journal as read was approved.

STAR-ROUTE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. MONEY. I rise to present a privileged report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, required to transmit to this House the papers called for in the resolution of the 30th instant, as follows, to wit:

"Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to this House all reports made by special agents of the Post-Office Department to the Postmaster-General during the year 1881 having reference to the star-route investigation and which have not heretofore been published and made public."

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CALKINS. Has that been referred?

The SPEAKER. It is a report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads on a resolution referred to that committee.

Mr. CALKINS. Is there a written report accompanying it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ascertain.

Mr. MONEY. There is no written report.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it necessary that a written report should accompany a resolution of inquiry referred in this manner and reported back by a committee?

The SPEAKER. As there seems to be some misapprehension in reference to the rule the Chair will cause it to be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk will read clause 2 of Rule XVIII.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. No bill, petition, memorial, or resolution referred to a committee, or reported therefrom for printing and recommitment, shall be brought back into the House on a motion to reconsider; and all bills, petitions, memorials, or resolutions reported from a committee shall be accompanied by reports in writing, which shall be printed.

Mr. MONEY. I ask leave to withdraw the report for the present.

The SPEAKER. The report is withdrawn.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—CHALMERS VS. MANNING.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I desire to give notice that on to-morrow morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal, I will ask the House to proceed to the consideration of the contested-election case of Chalmers vs. Manning.

WILLIE S. HOWARD.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent for immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be directed to inquire into the propriety of Willie S. Howard being employed as a page or folder under the Doorkeeper during the residue of the present session of Congress, and to report by resolution or otherwise.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Ohio will not object, at least until he is fully informed as to the facts in this case.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I will withhold the objection and hear the statement of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a little waif—the boy to whom reference is made in that resolution—who has probably been seen by most of the members of the House around the Capitol. It is thought possible that he may be employed in some connection in the Capitol, either as a page or folder, where he will be able to earn his own subsistence; and he seems to be worthy——

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I withdraw my objection on the ground that I apprehend this to be a matter of charity, and I am always willing to extend charity.

Mr. HOLMAN. No; it is not.

Mr. RANDALL. This lad is willing to work for his living.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I withdraw the objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to read the following:

Resolution of request to Congress in relation to the proposed Indian policy.

Whereas believing that civilization offers to the Indians the single alternative of gradual absorption or extermination, and that before they can be absorbed in the general population they must be carefully prepared for assimilation and citizenship, and profoundly impressed with the conviction that this result can only be accomplished by the Federal Government adopting such a policy as will do justice to the Indian and honor to the country, to be followed by appropriate current legislation to enforce the same: Therefore,

Resolved, That Congress be, and it is hereby, requested to pass resolutions solemnly pledging the faith of the nation to the Indian policy embodied in the following platform of principles:

Good faith.—Never break faith with the Indians.

Indian Territory.—Keep all intruders out of the Territory; continue the self-government of the civilized tribes; let them regulate their own land-tenure.

Law.—Enact suitable laws to protect life and property on reservations; make them flexible in detail; administer them through department orders approved by the President; promptly and rigidly enforce them; individualize the punishment of crime; never hold the tribe liable for the crimes of its members; organize an efficient Indian police force on every reservation.

Indian department.—Create a separate Indian department, under a civilian secretary; grant plenary emergency powers to the President; have all agencies frequently inspected by appointees of the President, well paid and unconnected with the Indian department; carefully regulate the powers and duties of Indian agents; give them permanent positions and liberal salaries; keep them free from political influence; let their subordinates be appointed by the department; all questions of general policy and treatment to be settled by the department; no individual experiments by theoretical agents to be permitted; abolish all privileged traderships; absolutely destroy all traffic in liquors; control the sale of arms and ammunition; in all else let there be free trade; let all military posts be maintained separate and apart from the Indian villages, and preserve absolute non-intercourse between the soldiers and the Indians.

No removals.—Remove no more tribes except where the soil and climate require it and the change is voluntary; civilize the Indians where they are.

Education.—Educate the entire Indian reservation population; teach the children in boarding manual-labor schools on the reservations; make them farmers and graziers; give all the bands an abundance of cattle; teach them trades; instruct them in the laws of health; show them how to live; neutralize the influence of the medicine-man; make work compulsory.

Lands in severalty.—On reservations divide land in severalty as soon as Indians can farm them; make them inalienable and non-taxable for a time; sell the surplus lands for the benefit of the tribe: elsewhere grant Government lands in severalty (on same terms) to all Indians who can cultivate them.

Citizenship.—Give citizenship to all self-supporting Indians who ask it.

A. M. LOWRY,
President, of Jamestown, N. Y.

Attest:

F. R. PETERSON,
As Clerk of the Village of Jamestown, N. Y.

Before the reading was completed,

Mr. HOLMAN said: Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to hear what is being read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is aware of that fact, and has made repeated appeals to members to preserve order so that the public business can be transacted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will it be in order to call for the regular order? I called for it a while ago, but I do not think the Chair heard me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not.

Mr. REED. Let us have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

RETIREMENT OF TRADE-DOLLARS.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a question of privilege. I move that the Committee on Banking and Currency be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3356) to provide for the retirement of the trade-dollar, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman state that there was an improper reference under the rules?

Mr. BLAND. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman send up the bill that the Chair may examine the matter.

Mr. REED and Mr. BUCKNER. Is this a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. According to the recollection of the Chair it was decided in the Forty-sixth Congress, upon a question which arose on the reference of a bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], that a question as to the improper reference of a bill was a privileged question. As the Chair now remembers, there was a great deal of discussion upon that question, and it was decided by a vote of the House. The Chair will send for the Journal containing the proceedings at that time, and in the mean while the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] can proceed with his statement.

Mr. BLAND. I have the Journal of the Forty-sixth Congress, and have marked the proceedings referred to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read from the Journal.

The Clerk read as follows from the House Journal of March 24, 1880:

The SPEAKER stated the regular order of business to be the proposition submitted by Mr. McLane on yesterday as a question of privilege, and pending when the House adjourned; the pending question being the question submitted to the House by the Speaker, as follows, viz: "Does the proposition submitted by Mr. McLane present a question of privilege under Rule IX?"

* * * * * * *

The question recurring on the resolution as stated by the Chair and being put, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 135, nays 98, not voting 59; the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the members present.

* * * * * * *

So the House decided that the proposition submitted by Mr. McLane presented a question of privilege under Rule IX.

Whereupon,

Mr. McLane modified the resolution heretofore submitted by him as follows, namely:

"Whereas the House, being of opinion that the reference of House bill No. 5265 to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws was incorreet under its rules, doth resolve that the said committee be discharged from its further consideration and the same be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means."

The SPEAKER. It appears to have been decided by the House in that case that the improper reference of a bill is a question of privilege.

Mr. BLAND. I have in my hand House bill 3356, which I submit was erroneously referred. The bill provides for nothing except the exchange of trade-dollars for standard dollars and their recoinage. It is a coinage bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill, so that the House may be able to determine this question.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3356) to provide for the retirement of the trade-dollar.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That trade-dollars shall be exchangeable at the office of the Treasurer and any assistant treasurer of the United States, and at any coinage mint, at par, for other silver coins of the United States, if presented within one year from the passage of this act; but no mutilated or fraudulently abraded trade-dollars and no trade-dollars that have been chopped or restamped for circulation in any foreign country shall be so exchangeable. Trade-dollars received in exchange for other silver coins as herein provided shall be recoined into standard dollars or other silver coins of the United States, as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct. And the further coinage of the trade-dollar is hereby prohibited.

SEC. 2. That all laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, the House certainly believed that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures had jurisdiction of this matter, for some fifty different bills, if I remember aright, with reference to this subject were referred to that committee early in the session. I know of no such bill which has been referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency except the one just read, which I believe was introduced and referred by a member of that committee. I may be mistaken on the latter point, but I know that no other bill of this kind has gone to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures have had that subject under consideration for the past two weeks. They have given it most careful consideration. The Director of the Mint has been before that committee. In fine, I may say, Mr. Speaker, we have given it such consideration as the magnitude of the subject demands, and the committee is now ready to report a bill this morning on the subject of the retirement of the trade-dollar. Now, when the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures is ready to report on the subject, I think it would be unwise on the part of those who desire the retirement of the trade-dollar to get up a contest between two committees of this House and between their several bills on the same subject. As I have already stated, the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures is ready to report when that committee is called in its order.

I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, that any other committee of this House shall usurp the jurisdiction properly belonging to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. If that committee has any jurisdiction under the rules of this House, it certainly must cover the coinage, weights, and measures of the country. I do not, therefore, consider it necessary at this time to enter into any discussion of the subject, as it must be apparent to every gentleman that the reference of this bill 3356 was inadvertently made, and that it ought to be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. STORM. May I ask the gentleman from Missouri one question?

Mr. BLAND. Certainly.

Mr. STORM. Does the action of the committee of which you are chairman recommend the retirement of the trade-dollar?

Mr. BLAND. It does.

Mr. CHACE. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] wish to speak further on the subject?

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen had better have some understanding about the occupation of the floor. The gentleman from Missouri, chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, is entitled, under the rules of the House, to one hour. He can reserve a part of his time now and let the other gentleman from Missouri proceed.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to reserve a portion of my time, but I am willing to yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. KEIFER. I have no disposition to cut off debate, but it occurs to me that this is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that the proposition is not debatable.

Mr. KEIFER. It is not debatable, it occurs to me, under paragraph 2, Rule XIII, where it provides:

The question of reference of any proposition other than that reported from a committee shall be decided without debate.

The SPEAKER. That question had occurred to the Chair, but the Chair is in some doubt, because it involves the question of discharging a committee from the further consideration of a bill as well as the reference of a bill to another committee.

Mr. KEIFER. The rule provides very clearly that the question of reference of any proposition other than that reported from a committee shall be decided without debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think the proposition is not debatable under the rule, as it has not been reported from a committee.

Mr. REED. Is not the question whether this is a question of privilege or not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that.

Mr. REED. That it is?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that.

Mr. REED. I supposed that was the question.

The SPEAKER. Of course that question was debatable in the discretion of the Chair for the purpose of informing the Chair.

Mr. REED. If the Chair is informed and has decided, it is not worth while to debate it further.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed he was informed and decided it, but of course he will hear any suggestion the gentleman has to make on it.

Mr. REED. I had a desire to quote the debate which I recollect partially at the time when the decision was had by the House which the Speaker caused to be read. If I recollect aright, and I make the statement subject to correction, for I have had no opportunity to refresh my memory—if I recollect aright, the reference was made to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws by referring simply to the number of the section of the statute. On examination it was discovered that reference had referred a question relating to the tariff to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. I think at the time the House felt that perfect openness was not displayed on the part of those who had referred the matter to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and that was the motive which caused the House to decide.

The SPEAKER. Still the Chair thinks——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire on that same point to say, Mr. Speaker, that the distinguished gentleman from Maine is entirely mistaken, and that he entirely misconceives what was the motive of the House in changing the reference. The House had no such motive as that which he has ascribed to it, as there was no lack of openness on the part of those who brought the matter to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. And a majority of this House sustained the reference of that bill to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

The SPEAKER. Whatever may have been the motive of the House, the Chair thinks the distinct question submitted to the House was whether a motion to correct an erroneous reference of a bill to a committee was a privileged question; and the House decided by vote that it was.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to be allowed a word of explanation right there, as I introduced the bill now in question. I remember calling the attention of the Speaker and the House to the bill at the time, saying I was in doubt as to its proper reference; that the subject-matter of the bill was of such a character that it might perhaps be properly referred either to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, or to the Committee on Banking and Currency. The Speaker thereupon made the reference to the Banking and Currency Committee; but the attention of the Speaker and the House was called to it at the time, so that the reference of the bill was the reference of the House.

Mr. CHACE. For all that it is evident that the reference of the bill to the wrong committee was a matter of inadvertence, and I think in that assertion the Speaker will bear me out.

Mr. BUCKNER. I should like to be heard on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency asks permission, as the other gentleman from Missouri has addressed the House, to make a statement.

Mr. BLAND. Before the gentleman proceeds I will say I have been asked by several members as to the effect or contents of the bill we are ready to report; and while I have no objection to debate on the part of the gentleman from Missouri the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I also ask the privilege of making that statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency asks leave, the Chair understands, to make a statement, occupying as much time as has heretofore been occupied by the gentleman from Missouri the chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. Is there objection?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. How long time does the gentleman ask?

Mr. BUCKNER. Only a short time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] occupied about five minutes. Is there objection to the other gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] being allowed an equal time? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CHACE. Does that cut off other debate?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the proposition is not debatable. This is by unanimous consent. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] will proceed.

Mr. BUCKNER. I only want to say, Mr. Speaker, that a bill of precisely similar import to this in the last Congress, after some controversy on the subject as well as I recollect, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency; that that committee reported back to this House a bill that received almost its unanimous vote and became law so far as the action of this House was concerned. And, further, while in this Congress this is the only bill of this character—perhaps there is one other—I undertake to say that according to a fair construction of the rule which governs questions of reference this bill is fairly referable to the Committee on Banking and Currency. I have no doubt about that.

I will say further, Mr. Speaker, that there was some controversy here as to the jurisdiction of these two committees while the Hon. Mr. Stephens was chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and out of deference to him the question was not tested. But I do say that when this trade-dollar gets into circulation as it has done it is currency; that the word currency is broad enough to cover every sort of circulation, whether gold or silver; and that a bill to retire that currency, whether it be gold or silver or paper, properly belongs to the Committee on Banking and Currency. That is the view I have of it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. CHACE. I ask unanimous consent to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] asks unanimous consent to be allowed to reply to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER]. How long time does the gentleman ask?

Mr. CHACE. Three minutes.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. If that privilege is granted to the gentleman from Rhode Island I shall ask the same privilege for myself, the Committee on Banking and Currency having placed this bill in my charge.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island and the gentleman from Pennsylvania ask to have each the privilege of addressing the House for three minutes.

Mr. CHACE. Let it be five minutes, but I do not think I shall speak over three minutes.

Mr. BLAND. I wanted my colleague on the committee the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] to have a few minutes, because I presume we have the right to close debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the ground on which he thinks the question is not debatable. The Chair regards it in the same aspect as if the bill were originally introduced and the question was as to its reference, which is not debatable under the rules of the House.

Mr. BLAND. Then I ask for ten minutes, of which five minutes shall be allowed to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERMENTROUT], and himself be allowed five minutes each.

Mr. WELLER. I object, unless I can have five minutes, too.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made to further debate, the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to discharge the Committee on Banking and Currency from the further consideration of the bill indicated and refer it to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. CHACE. I understood the House had given unanimous consent that I should have five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERMENTROUT] objected, unless he had the same privilege for five minutes. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 84, noes 34.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAND. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. That is unnecessary, as the bill can not be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

HOT SPRINGS, ARK.

Mr. COSGROVE. I rise to a question of privilege. I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to agree to the resolution relative to sending a committee to visit the Hot Springs, Ark. I now call up that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] calls up the motion to reconsider. The question is whether the vote shall be reconsidered.

Mr. COSGROVE. I do not know whether the question is debatable or not. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] desires to make a statement. If the question is not debatable, I shall ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, the resolution having been voted upon under the operation of the previous question, that the motion to reconsider is not debatable. If the vote shall be reconsidered, then the resolution will be divested of the effect of the previous question.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent of the House to make a very brief statement of the facts concerning the Hot Springs reservation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas, pending the motion to reconsider, asks unanimous consent to make a brief statement to the House.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I hope that objection will be withheld.

The SPEAKER. That must be addressed to the gentlemen making the objection.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I think it is important to make a statement at this time.

The SPEAKER. The objection is not withdrawn. The question is, Shall the vote by which the House refused to adopt the resolution in relation to the investigation at Hot Springs be now reconsidered?

The question was taken by a viva voce vote; and the Speaker announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. COSGROVE. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 63, noes 39.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. PAYSON called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, there being 13 in the affirmative—not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I make the point of order that no quorum voted on the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The point being made that no quorum voted, the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. BROWNE, and the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. ROGERS, to act as tellers.

Mr. BELFORD. Will the Chair again state the question? We do not understand it fully here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state it. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] calls up at this time the motion entered by him some days since to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to pass a resolution in relation to an investigation of the Government property at Hot Springs, Ark. No quorum having voted on the viva voce vote the Chair has appointed tellers, who will take their places.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 115, noes 66.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is, Shall the resolution pass? By the reconsideration the resolution is divested of the operation of the previous question, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I ask the Clerk to read the original resolution.

Mr. COSGROVE. There is a substitute pending.

The SPEAKER. The substitute is not yet pending.

Mr. COSGROVE. I desire to state that I wish to offer a substitute for the original resolution as soon as it is reported by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the original resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That a subcommittee of five members from the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department be directed to proceed to the town of Hot Springs, in the State of Arkansas, and make such investigation in respect to the work now being done upon Hot Springs Creek, on the Government reservation at that place, and in respect to such other matters as they have been heretofore directed by resolution of the House to investigate, and to report the result thereof as early as practical; that for the purpose of paying the expenses thereof the sum of $1,500 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House, the same to be expended by the Sergeant-at-Arms, under the direction of the committee.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. When this resolution was under consideration a few days ago I felt at the time that it was my duty to make the statement which I shall endeavor now to make. During the present session of Congress I have consumed perhaps not ten minutes of the time of the House, and I therefore ask its attention now while I endeavor to make a statement of the law and facts touching the Hot Springs reservation.

Especially do I invoke the attention of the members of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, for I understand that some of them regard the substitute which my friend from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] proposes to offer in lieu of the resolution which has just been read as perhaps a reflection upon that committee. It is due the gentleman from Missouri, and myself as well, to say that I requested the gentleman from Missouri to offer that substitute, the rules of the House depriving me of that right. When I shall have learned the rules of the House I am sure that no one will be more courteous to committees and gentlemen upon this floor than myself. I wish now to disclaim, in suggesting the substitute, any intention whatever of reflecting upon the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

In order that the House may understand the scope of the substitute which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] proposes to offer, I will ask that it be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That a special committee of three members, to be appointed by the Speaker, be directed to proceed to the town of Hot Springs, in the State of Arkansas, and make such investigation in respect to the work now being done upon the Hot Springs Creek, on the Government reservation at that place, and into the management of the hotel, the bath-house property, and hot-water privileges situated upon said reservation, under the act of Congress approved June 16, 1880, and report the result thereof as early as practicable, together with their recommendation as to what legislation is necessary and proper for the protection of the public interest and future management of said reservation and the property and hot water situated thereon.

That for the purpose of paying the expenses thereof the sum of $1,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House, the same to be expended by the Sergeant-at-Arms, under the direction of the committee.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. It will be observed from the reading of the proposed substitute that the scope of the duties of the committee that shall go to Hot Springs will be extended. There was an object in that, and that object is the point to which I desire now to call the attention of the House.

For thirty years prior to 1870 the Hot Springs reservation, containing four sections of land and embracing the entire natural supply of hot water at that place, was the subject of private litigation. In 1870 Congress passed an act authorizing the litigants to go into the Court of Claims to have their rights adjudicated, and if necessary to bring suits against the Government of the United States for the settlement of the question. Under that act various suits were brought in the Court of Claims and appeals were taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. In 1875 the Supreme Court rendered a decision that none of these claimants were entitled to any part of the Hot Springs reservation, but that the whole belonged to the Government of the United States.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, let me impress upon the House the fact that while these hot springs happened to be located in the district that I am endeavoring to represent upon this floor, yet it is no more a part of my duty to look after the interests of the Government in that regard than it is the duty of any other Representative who occupies a seat in this House. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that by reason of the location of this property in my district the people of Hot Springs expect me to give it that consideration and attention which it should have; yet as a matter of principle, a matter of right, a matter of duty, it is no more incumbent upon me than upon any other Representative to look after the interests of the Government in this particular.

Permit me to mention a point which I believe the House did not fully understand when this resolution was up for consideration. This is not a request, not a clamor by the people of Hot Springs for a donation to improve private property. It is, on the contrary, a simple question whether the Government will go on and complete the work which it has itself inaugurated upon its own property.

When the Supreme Court of the United States determined that this property belonged to the Government the question at once arose, what is to be done with it? A city of six or eight thousand people had grown up on this reservation, the parties supposing that they owned a good title to the property that they had bought. By a liberal and humane act Congress undertook to adjust the equities between the citizens and the Government, and five years ago all questions of that kind were determined by the commission appointed under the act of Congress or in cases litigated in the highest tribunal of this country.

Then the question arose what Congress should do with that part of the reservation upon which these celebrated waters were found. Congress in the very first act upon the subject settled one point—that this Hot Springs reservation should be forever dedicated to the United States and made inalienable for all future time. The proviso in the conclusion of that act reads as follows:

That all title given or to be given by the United States shall explicitly exclude the right to the purchaser of the land, his heirs or assigns, from ever boring thereon for hot water; and the hot springs, with the reservation mentioned, are hereby dedicated to the United States, and shall forever remain free from sale or alienation.

That was the first act of Congress settling the policy of the Government with reference to this reservation. By the terms of a second act upon the same subject, an act amendatory of the one from which I have just read, Congress determined another question of policy—that everything in the way of receipts, either from the sales of those parts of the reservation that the Government had determined to sell or from the leasing of perhaps $200,000 worth of improvements upon the Hot Springs reservation in the shape of bath-houses and hotel property as well as hot-water privileges, should be covered into the Treasury, and kept separate and apart for the improvement of this reservation which had been dedicated perpetually to the use of the United States.

In this connection let me invite attention to another proposition. The Government has never devoted one dollar to the improvement of the Hot Springs reservation that did not proceed from the source I have just indicated—that was not a part of the receipts from the sale of lands or the renting of houses and water privileges upon the reservation.

What was the next step? After setting apart this fund for the improvement of that reservation Congress some two or three years ago made an appropriation for the purpose of improving the creek which lies in the gorge of the mountain where the principal part of the city of Hot Springs stands, and constituting the front part of that portion of the reservation where the hot waters are found. The appropriation made at that time for the construction of this work—the walling and arching of this creek, a work absolutely indispensable in order to render the property of the Government accessible and valuable—has been exhausted, and the work of improving this creek stands to-day in an unfinished state and subject to be absolutely destroyed by the high water. About one hundred yards, perhaps, of the creek has been arched; perhaps more than half the creek has been walled and the débris, the rock, the rubbish, is thrown in the street, so that one side is absolutely impassable and the other not wide enough for two wagons to pass each other for perhaps more than half of the distance of half a mile over which the Government has undertaken to carry this work.

The first question is, Will the Government complete this work? Will Congress make an appropriation to go on with the work, or will it suffer it to be destroyed by the rains of the winter and spring? If a single freshet like that which came there two years ago should now occur, perhaps three-fourths of all the work already done would be completely swept away; for I myself saw, along the railroad near Hot Springs, places where the waters of the river had left the sediment upon the brush alongside the railroad as high as the car windows. This whole street was at that time swept by the flood, rendering this great highway in front of the Government property absolutely impassable at some points.

Mr. BELFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I prefer not to be interrupted just now, but will take great pleasure in yielding to the gentleman at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. BELFORD. I will defer my question until the gentleman gets through.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. There is another consideration upon this subject of the improvement of this creek. Much has been said through the public press or through other sources of there being some rascality, some dishonesty, in connection with this matter. Let me say in that respect so far as I am personally cognizant I know of nothing that would justify an investigation simply on that score alone. I do not pretend to say to the House that things have not gone crooked there, but I say I do not desire to assume the responsibility of sending an investigating committee there on the evidence in my knowledge that something has gone wrong or crooked in reference to these springs. Other gentlemen may be in possession of information that would justify the investigation solely on that ground. I am not.

But there is another feature in connection with this reservation to which I wish especially to invite the attention of the House. As I said a moment ago, the Government owns perhaps $200,000 worth of buildings on that reservation. Five years ago Congress passed an act authorizing the leasing of this property and the leasing of hot-water privileges on the reservation for a term of five years. That term has expired, the law has expired, and the Secretary of the Interior informed the President during the present session of Congress that there was no authority of law under which he was able to control and manage this reservation. Perhaps that is not the language he used, but that is the idea he expressed, and the President has invited the attention of Congress to the fact that he was without authority of law to proceed with the control and management of these hot-water privileges as well as these valuable improvements owned by the Government which are located upon this Hot Springs reservation. That matter is now before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds for investigation, and touching that question there have been complaints on both sides that the Secretary of the Interior, operating under the old law which has now expired, allowed the rights of the Government to pass into the hands of a monopoly, so that the great purposes and objects which the Government had in view when it enacted the law have been defeated by the action of a Secretary of the Interior himself operating under that law. On the other hand, it is asserted that parties who are indigent, unable or unwilling to do anything in the shape of improving the bath-houses, have leased property or water privileges with a view to compel others who were able to buy them out; in other words, a system of quasi blackmail. Now, the truth or falsity of these matters is something about which I know nothing, and about which I admit nothing to be true or untrue. One thing I do know, one thing I do assert, and that is, if the Government intends to hold on to this property according to any settled policy it ought to adopt that system of legislation, it ought to mature that system of legislation during the present session of Congress, which would take this whole subject out of the hands of Congress for the next twenty years. And it ought to do that with this idea in view, that these waters should be made accessible by legislation to the largest number of persons and at the lowest possible rate consistent with the interests of the Government and with the rights of those operating the bath-houses now located on the public grounds at these Hot Springs.

I say it is utterly impossible, Mr. Speaker, for that committee, knowing nothing of these transactions, not in possession of the facts, to mature such legislation as is necessary without some sort of investigation of what the Government ought to do. Whatever legislation is to be had at this session of Congress in reference to this reservation, or in reference to the valuable property located upon it, ought to be legislation carefully matured and permanently established, so the great purpose of the Government could be successfully carried into effect.

I believe I have nothing more to say at this time, but I will answer any question I can answer put by any gentleman of the House who desires information on this subject.

Mr. BELFORD. I have one or two inquiries to put to the gentlemen from Arkansas, if he will yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I will yield to the gentleman from Colorado for that purpose and answer his questions if I can do so.

Mr. BELFORD. In order that I may understand the subject under discussion I will put to the gentleman one or two inquiries, and the first one is, how much of this reservation is actually improved?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Relatively speaking, but a small amount of that which is perpetually dedicated to public uses.

Mr. BELFORD. I understood the Government had authorized certain hotel privileges at the springs, and I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether it is not the fact that the men who run this hotel have got a monopoly of these springs.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. My friend here says no; but I know myself they have not got a monopoly of the springs. I am not perfectly cognizant of the status there, as I have already stated in my remarks, but this is a question which requires investigation, with a view of maturing such legislation as will prevent any such monopoly. At this time there is no law governing it at all.

Mr. BELFORD. Let me ask another question, then. Do you not think it would be a good scheme to allow other parties, disconnected with this hotel, to obtain leases from the General Government, with a view to advancing and multiplying the facilities of that spring for the benefit of the public? I desire to vote for this, but certain suggestions have been made to me in reference to this matter.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I can not answer that question either yea or nay. It assumes, in the first place, the men who hold the hotel property have a monopoly. I do not know that to be so. I am informed otherwise; but if they have, they ought not to have it.

Mr. BELFORD. I say I understood they had, and to find out that fact I put the inquiry to the gentleman. I have not had those infirmities which would require me to go to the Hot Springs. [Laughter.]

Mr. OATES. I wish to ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama for that purpose.

Mr. OATES. I wish to ask the gentleman if it has not been alleged that the waters set apart at the Hot Springs for free baths for the benefit of the indigent have been greatly misused and the privileges abused so that their benefits do not go to those for whom they were set apart?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I have heard so. Indeed, I may say in response to the gentleman from Alabama that upon that point my information is authentic; and that these free baths, set apart for the indigent, for the poor people who are unable to pay their way, have been to a large extent monopolized for other purposes, and the parties for whose benefits this provision was made are largely excluded. Now, if that be true, it is a matter that should be corrected, and the truth or falsity of the statement ought to be determined by investigation. I called the attention of the Secretary of the Interior to that complaint, and he promised me to look into it and remedy the abuses if they exist.

Mr. MCADOO. Let me ask the gentleman from Arkansas why we can not investigate this matter just as well here as by sending a commission to the springs?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. There are several reasons, one of which is that it would largely increase the cost to undertake to bring these witnesses here. Another is that the information can be much better obtained on the ground. I say it is utterly impossible for a committee to make that character of careful investigation here which this subject demands, for the reason that the committee must be on hand to see the working of the system, to look over the ground itself, to see the people who are there, and hear all sides of the question; and, I repeat, this can be done at less expense by sending a committee than by bringing witnesses here.

Mr. MCADOO. Would the difference be material?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. It will cost $200 for each witness who is brought here. There are many witnesses who must be examined, while it is provided in this resolution that the whole cost of the investigation shall not exceed $1,000.

I now yield to the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

Mr. CLARDY. I wish to ask a question.

Mr. COSGROVE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COSGROVE. I did not suppose that I had yielded all the time to the gentleman from Arkansas, but believed that I still controlled the floor. There are gentlemen here who desire to offer some amendments, and I wanted to control the floor in order that they might be introduced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was not advised by the gentleman from Missouri how much time he proposed to yield to the gentleman from Arkansas, and supposed he yielded the floor. The gentlemen, however, can arrange that between themselves.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I only desire to yield the floor for a while to the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, and will hold it temporarily myself to answer a question which I understand the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] desires to propound. After that I shall be perfectly willing to relinquish it to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COSGROVE. That is all; I desire to have the floor so that an opportunity might be given for these amendments.

Mr. CLARDY. I wish now to ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question. I understood him in the outset of his remarks to say that he particularly desired the appointment of this committee from the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, and I expected to hear from him his reasons why he proposed to raise a special committee of this House rather than take it from the members of the committee that have had this subject under investigation.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I had intended to state the reasons, and I am much obliged to my friend for inviting my attention to the omission. My original idea was to ask for the appointment of a committee of five members. It was my wish that one of these should be taken from the Committee on Appropriations, which committee would have to deal with the question of the continuation of the work at Hot Springs, in order that that committee might have personal knowledge of the affairs at the Hot Springs. I desired that one of the committee should be taken from the Committee on Public Lands, because there is a certain part of the reservation which comes under the operation of the General Land Office, the Government having at Little Rock an agency for the sale of Government lands. In the third place, it was my wish that one of the members of the committee should come from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, because the jurisdiction of a part of the reservation comes under the control of that committee. And then I desired that one member should come from the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, and that the other would come from the House generally, as he might be selected by the Speaker. I was in hopes, however, that the composition of the committee would have been as I have suggested, my whole idea being to get one member from each one of these committees that had to deal with the subject-matter; and that was the whole reason that I asked for the formation of the committee in that manner.

On reflection, however, in order that this examination might be made as economically as possible, I concluded to drop two of the members which were to be appointed by the House, and have limited the number to three.

I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG. I only want about fifteen minutes.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Thirty-nine minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. I yield fifteen minutes.

Mr. YOUNG. I shall scarcely need so much time, Mr. Speaker. In view of the judgment of this House, as expressed by their votes two or three days ago on the recommendation of the committee of which I am chairman, in all probability it would be more proper and becoming if I were to permit this matter to pass without any argument on my part. I might waive any question of personal self-respect, but I do not feel at liberty to waive a question of respect for the committee over which I have the honor to preside.

As I stated, both in my verbal argument before the House and in the written report which I have submitted, it was not the wish of the committee to have the order of the House to visit Hot Springs. I stated then, as I do now, that the wanton and unfounded charge of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] that this committee was seeking, under the guise of a report to this House, to organize a junketing expedition at the public expense was a libel upon the committee and every gentleman who composed it. I yet entertain the same opinion.

As respects the wishes of the committee in visiting Hot Springs, we would prefer that this investigation should be made here. Individually we would prefer that some other committee of this House should be charged with the performance of that duty. We have no personal interest in this matter. It was not by our procurement that it was ordered by the House that we should make this investigation, and in all we have done in this matter, in the resolutions which we have offered and the reports which we have submitted to the House, we only desired to perform in a becoming and efficient manner the duties which the House by its resolution, unsought by us, confided to this committee.

I confess I was astonished at the action of the House when this matter was presented before. Perhaps it is accounted for by reasons not necessary now to recount. But I owe it to myself and to the committee to state again that our report was presented after conference with nearly every member of the Arkansas delegation; and therefore it was that I was surprised when one of them rose in his place on the floor and declared it did not meet his approval and another one of them voted against it.

Mr. DUNN. That is too strong a statement. I did not say the report did not meet my approval. I said I had not been consulted, and the report was not in any way based on any advice given by me at any time.

Mr. YOUNG. I am not quarreling with my friend from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN]. I am making this statement in justice to myself and to the committee to show to the House it was by none of our seeking that we were placed in this attitude.

Now, in respect to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE], providing for the appointment of a special committee, if I were to consult my public engagements here as well as my personal wishes, I should prefer that the substitute should be adopted; and if the House chooses to adopt it, I shall certainly urge no objection after I have made one or two other statements, which, in my judgment, should be considered before that substitute is adopted.

The resolution itself is defective in form. Nothing can be accomplished under the powers which it confers upon the proposed select committee. It is not proposed in that resolution that the select committee to be raised shall be clothed with the power to send for persons or papers or to administer oaths, to employ a stenographer or to have a clerk. Without these functions and powers such a committee had as well remain in the city of Washington as to go to Hot Springs. Without the power to summon witnesses, to send for papers, to administer oaths, to procure the services of a clerk or stenographer to take down the testimony, they would be utterly powerless to accomplish the object contemplated in the resolution.

Now, a word in reference to the necessity of sending a committee there at all. I never would have given my consent to the making of such a recommendation, nor do I believe that a single member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department would have done so, if we had not been entirely satisfied by the investigation we had made up to that time and by the facts which were laid before us that any investigation made here in Washington could result in nothing. It would be one-sided at the best.

There are probably fifty witnesses in Hot Springs that know or profess to know important facts bearing upon the object of this investigation. They would have had to be brought here at an expense of at least $5,000; and then their examination might not have resulted in anything satisfactory to this House, nor in the development of any facts upon which any committee of it would have felt warranted in making a report. A careful estimate of the expenses that would have been incurred in the visit of the subcommittee to Hot Springs satisfied me at the time that $1,500, the amount asked for in our original resolution, would be sufficient to cover all the expenses that would be necessary. Upon further consideration, however, and more mature investigation of the subject, together with inquiry from sources which could give me reliable information on that subject, I am satisfied now that $1,000 will cover the entire expense if prudently handled.

There can be no question that the investigation ought to be made. It is urgently demanded by considerations of public interest, many of which have been strongly and forcibly stated by my friend the Representative from that district. There is a difference of opinion, honestly entertained I have no doubt, among the people of Hot Springs as to whether or not the plan of this work is the proper one; whether or not its prosecution in accordance with the present plans and specifications will not be destructive to the public health of the town. They also differ as to whether or not the material used in its construction is of the proper character. They differ as to whether or not the material admitted to be good is being put up in a skillful and proper manner. Then I gather from the newspapers published in that town, from the proceedings of a public meeting held only two or three days ago and a memorial sent here by their city government, that a strong suspicion prevails that the money appropriated by the Government for the construction of the work has been misapplied. But I join in what the gentleman from Arkansas has so well said, that from the testimony before us I am not prepared to say that any part of that money has been improperly expended, though it has been charged in the public newspaper press of that town and at public meetings for more than a month past that such is the fact.

We have had before us the Assistant Secretary of the Interior; and I do him the credit to say that so far as I was able to judge he made a fair, full, frank, and honest statement of his action in the matter, and insisted that as a matter of right and justice to him this investigation should be had, so that if he was falsely accused, if he was wrongfully charged with improper official conduct, he might be vindicated by the action of this House, and if guilty, that the fact should be known; and in this I agree with him.

Mr. BLOUNT. Allow me to ask the gentleman if the question of the leases is to be inquired into?

Mr. YOUNG. That is one of the things the Secretary desires to have examined.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman misunderstands me. He is insisting upon the passage of this resolution on the ground that the Secretary of the Interior thinks that he has a right to be investigated, as charges have been made against him. I ask the gentleman if those charges relate simply to the leasing of the property?

Mr. YOUNG. The gentleman misunderstands me. I did not state that the Secretary of the Interior demanded an investigation as a right, but I did state, which is the fact, that when the Secretary of the Interior was before us he requested that the investigation might be prosecuted and all the facts brought out.

In reference to the lease of the property, we had an informal conversation on that subject, and our attention was directed to the law under which this property is at present leased. It will be at once apparent to any lawyer from the most casual examination of the law that there are glaring defects in it which ought to be corrected at once.

More than $200,000 has been expended at Hot Springs by the lessees of the Government in the erection of bath-houses, and there has been perhaps an annual expenditure of $20,000 more to keep the improvements in a proper state of repair. Under existing law their tenure is by lease for five years, without any power on the part of any officer of the Government, as the law is construed by the Interior Department, to extend such lease beyond that period.

The Secretary of the Interior is of the opinion that Congress, by appropriate legislation, should make some definite term of leasehold under which this property may be held, and I am myself of the same opinion. Congress ought either to take the property and hold it as the property of the Government, to be managed by a Government superintendent, or else it ought to lease, under proper restrictions, for such a term of years as would warrant the lessees in making the necessary improvements and keeping the property in a proper state of repair.

All that my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] has said in reference to the importance of an early prosecution of this work I most heartily indorse. This is a place of national health resort, perhaps the most famous in the world. It is every day growing in reputation, and every year the number of visitors that flock there is increasing. For the year preceding the 1st day of September last 36,000 invalids had visited Hot Springs, and the number will most likely increase every succeeding year, and the time is not far distant in the future when it will be the Baden-Baden of this country. We therefore need to be careful in any legislation that is ventured upon in respect to a subject of such public importance.

As properly stated by the gentleman from Arkansas, he has no more interest in this matter than a Representative from South Carolina or from any other State. Every citizen of this country is equally interested in the Hot Springs, in the proper application of its curative properties, and in its maintenance as a health resort.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Is he aware of the price at which the Arlington Hotel was turned over to the Government?

Mr. YOUNG. I am. I was here when the law was passed authorizing it. The lessees of that property pay $1,000 per annum.

Mr. REAGAN. How much did they get for the property?

Mr. YOUNG. The price fixed by the commissioners was $22,500, but it has never been paid by the Government.

Mr. DUNN. The Government never paid a dollar for the property. It was condemned by the commission in the interest of the present proprietors at $22,500; but Congress refused to allow them to be paid for it. It allowed them either to take the property and use it on a lease which they had of the ground on which it stood or to surrender the property and take their pay for it. They kept the property. That is the attitude it now is in.

Mr. YOUNG. That is true. They were allowed that amount upon a valuation fixed by the Hot Springs commissioner, and a certificate as directed by law for the sum of $22,500, which certificate they have in their possession yet; no part of it has been paid by the Government. They hold the Arlington Hotel by a leasehold, under an act of Congress, for ten years, at $1,000 a year.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to ask the gentleman who has charge of the construction of the works there?

Mr. YOUNG. The Interior Department.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I would like to ask my friend further whether the Interior Department has not the necessary facilities in men and means to investigate that work as to the material employed and every other matter connected with the construction, quite sufficient to protect the Government and quite as effective as would be a committee of members of this House?

Mr. YOUNG. The Interior Department, or an officer of that Department, is the very one we are called upon to investigate. He is charged with wrongdoing in the prosecution of the work. But as I said before, the committee have no evidence before them so far that the charge is true or upon which we can base any judgment at all. The Department has furnished us with all the means at its command to make the investigation, but we have found them inadequate; otherwise we would have proceeded without bringing the matter before the House.

Mr. COSGROVE. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] desires to offer an amendment to the substitute, and I will yield to him to have it read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by inserting, after the words "under the act of Congress approved June 16, 1880," that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The said committee shall also inquire into the leases which have been made by the Government at said springs, the fairness thereof, and whether the conditions thereof have been fulfilled, and into all matters connected with the Government property and the management thereof at said springs; and whether the interests in said springs have been monopolized to the injury of the public; and shall have power to send for persons and papers and examine witnesses.

Mr. COSGROVE. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eighteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. COSGROVE. I am inclined at this time to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. But I also wish to yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COX] and then to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] to offer amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COX] will send up his amendment. Is it to the original resolution or to the substitute?

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. It is to the substitute.

The SPEAKER. No further amendment to the substitute is in order, there being an amendment already pending offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], being an amendment in the second degree.

Mr. COSGROVE. I will accept it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can modify his substitute as he chooses.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment of Mr. COX, of North Carolina, as follows:

And the said committee shall further inquire whether the interests of the Government would be promoted by selling its interest in said property, and report their conclusions.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri accept the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COX]?

Mr. COSGROVE. I do.

The SPEAKER. Then the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri will be considered as so modified.

Mr. ELLIS. I desire to offer, if it be in order, a substitute for all the propositions.

Mr. COSGROVE. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana proposes as a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri what the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department having been heretofore directed by resolution of the House to make certain investigations in respect to the public work being done at Hot Springs, in the State of Arkansas, and as to the management of the public property on the Government reservation at that place; and the said committee having reported to the House that the said investigation can not be properly made by summoning witnesses from Hot Springs and other places except at a cost to the Government of several thousand dollars, and that a subcommittee of five could proceed to Hot Springs and there make the investigation provided for in a more satisfactory manner and at very much less cost: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department is hereby authorized and directed to send a subcommittee, consisting of five of its members, to town of Hot Springs, in the State of Arkansas, for the purpose of making the investigation heretofore ordered by the House; and that the said subcommittee be, and the same is hereby, authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, and administer oaths; and that for the purpose of paying the cost thereof the sum of $1,000 is hereby appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House, the same to be expended by the Sergeant-at-Arms under direction of said committee.

Mr. COSGROVE. I wish to raise a point of order. It seems to me that this substitute is simply a reoffering of the original resolution, with the exception that the sum of $1,000 is inserted instead of $1,500.

Mr. ELLIS. A further difference is that the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department is charged with this duty by the substitute.

Mr. COSGROVE. That was the original proposition. The substitute, as I understand, is exactly like the original resolution, except that it proposes an appropriation of $1,000 instead of $1,500.

Mr. YOUNG. The original resolution did not provide, as this substitute does, that the committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, &c., a power very necessary if the investigation is to be properly made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the two propositions differ in several material respects.

Mr. COSGROVE. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana, that he may explain his proposition.

Mr. ELLIS. I do not believe it would be treating properly the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department if, after having charged that committee with this investigation, we should now take the matter out of its hands. As I understand, this House by a resolution adopted some time ago devolved upon that committee the duty of making this investigation. As I am informed the committee has already performed some of the preliminary work relating to the investigation. Some of the parties interested have already been before the committee. The committee has also obtained plans and drawings of the entire work. It has been devoting time and attention to the matter.

Now, while I listened with great pleasure to the lucid statement of my friend from Arkansas, which strengthened me in the opinion that this investigation ought to be made, yet I failed to appreciate the full force of the reason which he gave for desiring to take this investigation from the committee already charged with it and give it to a special committee. The Committee on Appropriations has already been crippled by the sickness and absence of some of its members, and has thus been unable to call subcommittees together. The Committee on the Public Lands is in conflict with the "giant monopolies" of this country in connection with railroad land grants and all that sort of thing. [Laughter.] It is not wise to cripple any of the busy committees of this House by taking away its members when we have a committee specifically charged by a resolution of the House with this duty. Such a course appears to me to offer—though I know my friend from Arkansas would be the last man to do that—an absolute indignity to the committee in taking this matter from its hands after it has been charged with it.

I will say further that it is necessary that a subcommittee shall go to Hot Springs. Although some of the witnesses are able to come and have come, many of the people interested in this investigation are not able to come. The expense of the investigation will be diminished by sending a subcommittee.

Mr. MCADOO. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. He has spoken of "crippling" the leading committees of the House. Is it not a fact that many of the members of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department are also members of other committees, important committees of the House; and when they go away will not these committees be just as much "crippled" as if the Speaker appointed a subcommittee?

Mr. ELLIS. I am not aware that such is the fact.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COSGROVE. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER. Nine minutes.

Mr. COSGROVE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I think it very important the committee which has had charge of this matter for some time, which has been making various investigations, which has been in communication with the Interior Department and numbers of witnesses, and brought forward a resolution for investigation to this House, should not be cut short in that work by this House, and the investigation turned over to a new committee, which may not be so well qualified by information to make it. It seems to me, as has been suggested by others, the unreasonableness of the proposition is a reflection on that committee which this House ought not to make. And unless there is such reflection intended by it there is an absolute impropriety in doing it at all.

I appreciate the suggestion of economy in reducing the committee from five to three and would have preferred it, but the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department has assured us that three members will not be sufficient to make the investigation. I do not know the number of witnesses to be examined, I do not know the variety of issues to be raised, but I conceive with the most perfect propriety and with due regard to the public interests the gentleman may have concealed, as he ought to conceal, the whole scope of the proposed investigation. I am willing if the investigation is to be had, if there are allegations of the misappropriation of funds, if there are frauds at the Hot Springs to be investigated, if it is proper that the investigation shall be had, that the chairman of the committee which has had this subject under consideration shall come into this House with a committee of not three but five members and provided with ample powers to make thorough inquiry. There are reasons which the committee of this House have reported are sufficient, and there are reasons which a Cabinet officer of the Government has said are ample, and I am willing if it is to be done to trust a Cabinet officer and a committee of this House, especially when they have been investigating the subject for weeks, not only as to the number of the committee but the scope of the inquiry. I am not in favor of "swelling" committees, but when an investigation is to be had I am not for tying the hands of the committee. Therefore I trust if anything is to be done the original proposition as reported from the committee having charge of the subject will be adopted.

Mr. COSGROVE. Mr. Speaker, I wish simply to state that so far as I am concerned I have no personal motive in this matter whatever. When I offered the substitute it was distinctly understood between the gentleman and myself that I should not be on the committee. I thought five were too many, and that $1,500 would be more than would be required.

Mr. CLARDY. I ask my colleague to yield to me for one minute.

Mr. COSGROVE. Certainly.

Mr. CLARDY. I do not know I can say anything in addition to what has been said by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG]. I trust I shall not offend good taste in what I shall say. The House remembers when the original resolution was presented by the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department that resolution was beaten, and I must confess my astonishment when a motion was made to reconsider that vote to-day. But the House voted to reconsider it, and a substitute was at once offered which indicated very clearly that the opponents of it had no faith either in the honesty or the competency of the members of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department. I can say, so far as I am concerned myself, that I announced to the committee that under no circumstances could I go to the Hot Springs. It can not, therefore, be suspected I want to visit that resort for the purpose of pleasure, for it would be utterly impossible for me to go at all. But I say in behalf of that committee what the gentleman from Tennessee has said, that I do not think the substitute offered by the gentleman from Arkansas should be adopted unless the House believes the members of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department are either incompetent or dishonest. That is all I have to say.

Mr. COSGROVE. I certainly do not take any of the remarks of my colleague as applicable to myself, for I have neither said nor acted in the matter in a way to justify anything that would make his remarks applicable to me, and I suppose they are not so intended.

I yield a minute to the gentleman from Arkansas, who wishes to be heard.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I took occasion before this resolution came up to-day to consult with my friend from Missouri, and also with the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, with reference to this subject. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House that I do not recall at this time what other gentlemen constitute that committee except the two to whom I have referred. The reason that I had this conference with them was that I might express to them my views upon the subject so that they might confer with each other and explain the idea I had in view. I thought I had made it clear to them that nothing was intended which would justify the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri who has just taken his seat. I thought I had made a full and perfect disclaimer of anything of that sort, and also that on his inquiry I had given the reasons why it would be wiser and more prudent in my judgment to select this special committee in the manner I have indicated. I now repeat the reasons, and with that repetition I disclaim any other motive or object than what I have already stated to the House. I suggested that I hoped the Speaker of this House would in his wisdom, if this resolution passed and this special committee should be authorized, select a member of that committee from the Committee on Public Lands, for the reason that that committee might have further legislation touching that part of the reservation over which they had jurisdiction if they deemed it essential. I said I hoped one member would come from the Committee on Appropriations, so that the committee which had control of the appropriation for continuing the work there would have personal knowledge of the needs of the service. I said also that I hoped one would come from the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, of which the gentleman is a member, because that committee had jurisdiction over part of the subject-matter, namely, the expenditures on Hot Springs Creek, and also that another member would be taken from any committee having jurisdiction over some part of the subject. These reasons may not be ample to satisfy the minds of gentlemen as to the necessity of organizing the committee in that way, but to my mind they are strong, and they are the only ones I had in view.

Mr. COSGROVE. I now demand the previous question on the division of the resolution and amendments.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman will not do that. I wish to call attention to the fact that the debate has been altogether on the side of the friends of this measure, and no opportunity has been given to those who are opposed to it.

Mr. COSGROVE. I must insist upon the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department having been heretofore directed by resolution of the House to make certain investigations in respect to the public work being done at Hot Springs, in the State of Arkansas, and as to the management of the public property on the Government reservation at that place; and the said committee having reported to the House that said investigation can not be properly made by summoning witnesses from Hot Springs or other places except at a cost to the Government of several thousand dollars; and that a subcommittee of five could proceed to Hot Springs and there make the investigation provided for in a more satisfactory manner and at very much less cost: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department is hereby authorized and directed to send a subcommittee, consisting of five of its members, to the town of Hot Springs, in the State of Arkansas, for the purpose of making the investigation heretofore ordered by the House; and that the said subcommittee be, and the same is hereby, authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths; and that for the purpose of paying the cost thereof the sum $1,000 is hereby appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House, the same to be expended by the Sergeant-at-Arms under the direction of the said committee.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has been read.

Mr. ELLIS. Can I amend by substituting three instead of five members?

Mr. RANDALL. That will make the amount of money, $1,000, cover the expenses.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent.

If there be no objection that modification will be made.

There being no objection, the amendment was modified by striking out "five" and inserting "three."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 36.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] be incorporated as a portion of that amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLOUNT. Let it be reported.

The SPEAKER. It will be read in its proper connection with the amendment already adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the resolution the following:

"The said committee shall also inquire into the leases which have been made by the Government at said springs, the fairness thereof, and whether the conditions thereof have been fulfilled, and into all matters connected with the Government property and the management thereof at said springs, and whether the interests in said springs have been monopolized to the injury of the public; and shall have power to send for persons and papers."

Mr. HOLMAN. The last part of that, "shall have power to send for persons and papers," should be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. That will be done. Is there objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from Louisiana to incorporate this as a part of the amendment just agreed to?

There was no objection.

Mr. McADOO. I ask unanimous consent for incorporation into the substitute of the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina enlarging the scope of this investigation.

Mr. ELLIS. I accept the suggestion and hope unanimous consent will be given.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Before that is done do I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is to be incorporated as it was read? If so, I must object. I do not see why they should not send for persons and papers from here as well as from Hot Springs or elsewhere.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asked for objection and none was made. The amendment is not incorporated as read. A part of it was stricken out.

Mr. ELLIS. I make the point of order that the objection of the gentleman comes too late.

The SPEAKER. The objection is well taken. The Chair asked for objection and none was made.

Is there objection to the incorporation of the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon adopting the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] as amended.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 76, noes 40.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LONG. Let the resolution as amended be read.

The resolution as amended was read.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 22—not a sufficent number.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I should like to have had the yeas and nays, and then to have seen the list of gentlemen voting placed side by side with the list of the other day.

So (further count not being called for) the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. ELLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. COX, of New York, said: I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX, of New York. Was not the resolution of inquiry reported by my friend from Georgia [Mr. CLEMENTS] from the Committee on Foreign Affairs a privileged matter? And if so, why should it go to the House Calendar?

The SPEAKER. It went to the House Calendar because it was reported during the morning hour for the call of committees for reports. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CLEMENTS] will withdraw the report, it being privileged, he can make it at any other time and call for its immediate consideration. Does the gentleman withdraw the report?

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. MONEY. I wish to present at this time the privileged report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads which was withdrawn this morning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the report to which the gentleman from Mississippi refers cannot be entertained while this question is pending.

Mr. COBB. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield to me for a moment to submit a resolution from my committee in regard to the business of the House. I think it will take but a moment, and is very important.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I would like very much to yield, but no appropriation bill has yet been considered. I must, therefore, insist upon my motion.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. CONVERSE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the order of the House being to consider the naval appropriation bill.

The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

House bill No. 4716, making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I move that the first formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to ask my colleague on the committee the chairman of the subcommittee whether it is his intention now to indicate what length of time he proposes shall be consumed in the general debate on this bill.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I suppose it will be improper to take any action upon that until we go back into the House, as we can not limit the debate in committee.

Mr. CALKINS. I am aware of that, but I thought perhaps the gentleman would indicate what his intention was.

Mr. HUTCHINS. If we can go on to-day and see what progress we make I will be better able to answer that question at some future time. I propose that there shall be full discussion as far as members may desire.

I ask for the reading of the report accompanying the bill.

I may state to the members of the committee that if they will give their attention to the reading of this report it will do away with the necessity of any explanation or remarks on my part upon this question. The report is not long, and it covers all points of new legislation proposed in this bill. The usual appropriations for the running of the naval establishment are made, but there are three new provisions embraced in the bill, which may or may not give rise to some discussion in the committee. It is unnecessary for me to detain the members by any remarks if they will attend to the reading of the report. I now call for its reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

In presenting for the consideration of the House the bill making appropriations for the support of the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, the Committee on Appropriations submit the following in explanation thereof:

The estimates upon which the bill is based are to be found in the Book of Estimates for 1885, pages 95 to 106, inclusive, and excluding the sum of $92,251, recommended for the Naval Asylum, which is payable from the naval pension fund, aggregate $22,655,500.38, of which amount the committee recommend the appropriation of $14,263,195.95, being a reduction of $8,392,304.43 under the estimates. The amount appropriated for the naval service for the current fiscal year is $15,894,434.23, being $1,631,238.28 more than is recommended for the year 1885 in the accompanying bill.

The bill makes provision for completing and equipping (except ordnance) the four steel cruisers in accordance with the estimates submitted by the Secretary. It appropriates nothing for continuing the work on the iron-clad monitors, but provides $5,000 for their care and preservation when they shall have been turned over to the Government by the contractors, and reappropriates the unexpended balance of the appropriation for their engines and machinery, and applies the same to the use of the Bureau of Steam Engineering for the next fiscal year.

New legislation is recommended in the bill as follows:

"Hereafter none of the vacancies in the various grades in the line and in the staff corps of the Navy shall be filled by promotion until such grades shall be reduced to the numbers fixed for the several grades of the line and the staff corps of the Navy by the act of August 5, 1882, making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

* * * * * * *

"Provided, That all enlisted men and boys in the Navy, attached to any United States vessel or station, and doing duty thereon, and naval cadets, shall be allowed a ration or commutation thereof in money, under such limitations and regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe.

"And from and after the passage of this act there shall be no appointments, except by promotion, to fill vacancies occurring in the list of commissioned officers of the Marine Corps until the number of such officers shall have been reduced by casualties or otherwise below seventy-five; and after the number of officers shall be reduced as above provided the whole number of commissioned officers on the active-list in the Marine Corps shall not exceed seventy-five.

* * * * * * *

"That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to report to Congress at its next and each regular session thereafter the amount expended during the prior fiscal year from the appropriations for the pay of the Navy, Bureaus of Navigation, Ordnance, Equipment and Recruiting, Yards and Docks, Medicine and Surgery, Provisions and Clothing, Construction and Repair, and Steam Engineering, for civilians employed on clerical duty or in any other capacity other than ordinary mechanics and workingmen, and to submit under the estimates for pay of the Navy and for the respective bureaus enumerated above specific estimates for such civilian employés for the fiscal year 1886 and each fiscal year thereafter.

* * * * * * *

"That no officer whose name is borne on the retired-list of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps shall hold position in the civil service or other employment of the Government, and draw the salary or compensation thereof together with his pay as a retired officer of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps: Provided, That any such retired officer accepting a position in the civil service or other employment of the Government may at the time of acceptance elect to take the salary of such position or in lieu to retain his pay as a retired officer."

The bill also provides that no portion of the sums appropriated for the Bureaus of Construction and Repair and Steam Engineering shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ship, or the engines and machinery thereof, when the estimated cost of such repairs shall exceed 30 instead of 20 per cent., as heretofore provided, of the estimated cost of a new ship of the same size and like material or new engines and machinery of the same character and power.

I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Indiana my colleague on the committee.

Mr. CALKINS. One hour?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from New York to yield the floor?

Mr. HUTCHINS. I yield the floor. How much time does the gentleman from Indiana desire?

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to consume my entire hour or else reserve it for the benefit of other members on this side.

Mr. HUTCHINS. You want an hour, then, in your own right?

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from New York yields the floor.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Chairman, in discussing in general debate the provisions of the appropriation bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations to the House, and which is now before us, I shall only glance at some of its features with which I do not concur, calling the attention of the Committee of the Whole to those provisions, to indicate what my judgment is and what I think Congress ought to do. It will be seen by an examination of the bill that there is a large reduction in expenditures over the estimates, and quite a reduction over the appropriation of last year. It is not improper for me to say at the outset of my remarks that the appropriation bill of last year was prepared and presented by a member of the then House thoroughly familiar with the Navy Department. It is an open secret that there were a good many items in that appropriation bill which were arbitrarily cut down. As to the wisdom of the process which was adopted last year I have nothing to say, for it is a matter of history and need not now be discussed. I may say further that all reasonable reductions, all measures of economy in the expenditure of the public moneys, whether made in the naval service or any other of the departments of the Government without crippling the public service, meet my hearty approval. There are, however, in this bill some provisions which I regard as unwise, and which in my judgment will in some degree cripple the service if adhered to.

I may as well say here that I do not have very much hope of changing this bill materially, because I know very well the gentlemen in charge of it on the subcommittee and on the Committee on Appropriations will stand very close by the recommendations in the bill. All I can do is to point out to the committee and the country what I think ought to be done and leave it there.

The first item in the bill to which I call attention and which is a matter of legislation will be found on page 2. This provision in the bill is not of itself an economical provision, although incidentally it may save some money to the Government. It provides that hereafter no vacancies shall be filled in any of the grades in the Navy until the minimum is reached which has heretofore been fixed by law.

Mr. Chairman, there was an act passed in 1878, if I remember aright, reducing the number of officers in the line in the Navy to six hundred and twenty; I may not be strictly accurate as to the year in which this law was passed. There are now seven hundred and eight officers in the line, and the number when reduced to the minimum will be six hundred and twenty. In 1880 a law was passed by which it was provided that there should be one promotion for every two vacancies in the line and that there should be no promotions whatever in the staff until the minimum was reached. In 1882 on the last appropriation bill the line and the staff were placed upon the same plane and the provision of law was made to apply to both, that there should be one promotion for every two vacancies.

The purpose of this provision was to give some flexibility to the law and not allow the younger officers of the Navy to run up, as it were, against a wall and stand there for ten or twelve years without promotion, but to give promotion to younger officers, both in the line and staff, one for each two vacancies, so that promotions might not entirely cease.

The bill that is reported this year provides that that law shall be repealed, and that there shall be no promotions made until the minimum is reached. The effect of that will be that the officers of the Navy in their present rank will stand perfectly still for a period of five or seven years, and there will be no promotions made in the Navy during that period. If, however, the law is allowed to remain as it now is, in from ten to twelve years the reduction will have been effected, and meanwhile promotions will be gradually made in the line and staff. I think that a wise provision. The last Congress, by a considerable majority, adopted that provision. It was then the opinion of Congress that the younger men in the Navy ought in justice to themselves and in justice to the contract which we made with them when they went into the Navy not have the door of promotion absolutely shut in their face for six or eight years. At the proper time I shall move to strike out this provision in the present bill so as to allow the law to stand as it was last year and in 1880.

On that point, Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to print, as part of my remarks, a letter written by Richard T. Merrick, esq., of this city. The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 12, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I beg leave to call your attention to that provision in the naval appropriation bill embraced in the lines from No. 31 to 38, inclusive, forbidding promotions in the service until the respective grades into which such promotions might otherwise be made have been reduced to the numbers fixed by the act of August 5, 1882.

This subject was very fully considered when the act of 1882 was before Congress, and it was finally determined that promotions should be made to fill alternate vacancies only until the respective grades should be reduced as indicated.

This interruption of the regular order of promotion was deemed a very severe grievance by the officers in the service, but the measure now proposed is an oppressive and an unjustifiable hardship.

Is the organization of the Navy never to be at rest? Does the public good require that the officers in the service should be in perpetual apprehension that each succeeding Congress is to impair their rights, dampen their hopes, and diminish their prospects of usefulness and advancement? Is there to be no end to personal legislation in regard to this branch of the public service?

If the proposition referred to should become a law, the young men now in the service, and who entered it under the assurance of then existing statutes that they could expect a reasonable advance in rank as life progressed, must abandon that hope, and content themselves with the dreary prospect of growing gray before they reach even the grade of lieutenant, and certainly before ever getting beyond it.

It seems to me that the proposed legislation is revolting to a natural feeling of justice.

I submit as a substitute the proposition inclosed, in order that if the present condition requires some remedy, that remedy may be the outcome of deliberate thought and careful examination, and that when applied the officers of the Navy may feel some assurance of the stability of the law.

With great respect, yours, truly,

R. T. MERRICK.

Hon. WILLIAM H. CALKINS.

The next point to which I desire to direct attention is what I believe to be a serious mistake made by the committee in reporting this bill in one item, under the head of Bureau of Navigation. The appropriation last year for this bureau was $100,000. This year the committee have reported to the House an appropriation of $75,000. The estimates submitted by the Navy Department were $130,000. It may be said that there was no deficiency reported by this bureau and that it was found that $100,000 was sufficient to run the bureau, and that a saving was made of some $37,000 in this bureau, which was expended by its chief, and which may now be cut off, put in the general fund, and saved. Upon that point I desire to say that there was $37,000 saved by the chief of this bureau on account of pilotage. That money, instead of being paid to pilots, was used by the chief of the bureau in buying charts and compasses and other useful articles for use on the various ships in the Navy under his charge. He says, and I have no doubt of it, that when this amount was saved by him it was applied to this useful purpose for the benefit of the Navy and that it did benefit the Navy, and that one great object of the saving was to compass that result. I think it unwise to cut it off. I believe it wise to allow this officer to save from pilotage and any other sources that he can, that he may better prepare the naval vessels for their duties in the fleets.

I may speak a moment, Mr. Chairman, with reference to the consolidation of some of these bureaus. I took occasion last year, when the Navy appropriation bill was before the House, to submit some remarks upon the question of the consolidation of bureaus. I said then and I believe now that the Bureau of Construction and Repair ought to be consolidated with the Bureau of Steam Engineering. I know that there are some men in the Navy, not only of the United States but also in the other navies of the world, who are inclined to the idea of wooden vessels. But experience has taught us and is fast teaching the world that the day of wooden vessels has gone, and that hereafter the navies of the world will be constructed from other material.

I know that constant clashing is occurring all the time in these two bureaus; but I believe the Bureau of Construction and Repair must finally yield to the Bureau of Steam Engineering, and for this purpose these two bureaus should now be consolidated, and put under some competent person, to be appointed by the President, and thereafter be managed as one bureau.

I pointed out last year how these two bureaus had been operating as separate bureaus, both of them charged with the construction and repair of vessels; one, the Bureau of Construction and Repair, having charge of the hull, and the other, the Bureau of Steam Engineering, having charge of the engines and machinery. They were so far apart that in several instances, to which I referred, it was found that the hull and the engines had been constructed without reference to each other, so that when the hull of the vessel was completed it was found that the engines and machinery did not fit at all, they having been under the charge of the other bureau, and the consequence was that in order to get the engines in the vessel it had to be torn apart, sometimes laid vertically, and sometimes entirely reversed from the original intention.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I would like to have the gentleman state to the House in a few words, which I know he can do, what are the specific duties of each of these bureaus; also to state to the House whether or not the Bureau of Construction and Repair is not the most important bureau of the Navy Department, to which we are now looking for an increase of our Navy. In other words, I would like to have him state whether the Bureau of Construction and Repair is not the most important bureau, and whether the Bureau of Steam Engineering is not quite secondary.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] and myself will have no difficulty upon that head at all. The Bureau of Construction and Repair, as I have already remarked, does model the ship, make the hull, and attend to all that sort of work, while the Bureau of Steam Engineering plans and constructs the engines and machinery and fits them to the vessel. But when you have two bureaus that do not work together, each one of them working "on its own hook," if I may be allowed the expression, it will be found, as has already been shown, that when you bring the several parts of the vessel together they will not fit each other. It is therefore high time that the two bureaus should be brought under one head, so that the several parts of a vessel when finally constructed shall fit each other.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. How can the Navy Department be carried on without having these two bureaus? Who would you put at the head of the joint bureau if you consolidate them? Would it be an officer brought up to the planning of ships or would it be an engineer in the Navy acquainted with engines and boilers?

Mr. CALKINS. My own idea about that is that a good, competent engineer should be placed in charge of this bureau. When an amendment is offered, it may be thought best that the question as to who should be at the head of this consolidated bureau ought to be left to the Secretary of the Navy or the President.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I hope before this bill shall pass I may have an opportunity of showing this committee that the Bureau of Construction and Repair is the most important bureau of the Navy Department, and is the bureau which plans and constructs the ships of the Navy. I also wish to show that unless we know distinctly who is to be appointed at the head of the consolidated bureau we had better proceed very carefully in the matter of consolidation.

Mr. CALKINS. I can not yield further to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL], however much I would like to do so. I will simply submit for the benefit of gentlemen what the Secretary of the Navy says on this subject. On page 27 of the report of the Secretary of the Navy will be found the following:

It is, however, beyond dispute that methods of naval construction must change from the transition from wooden to steel vessels. It will be found impossible for two independent and equal bureau chiefs to design and supervise the construction of a modern vessel—the one that of the hull, and the other that of the machinery—and bring all parts together in one perfect ship, without differences of opinion which can not longer be safely decided by a common superior who does not possess technical skill. The true solution is to unite these two bureaus as a single bureau of naval construction, having for its chief the most competent naval architect that can be found, whether among the present officers of the Navy or in civil life.

Mr. BELFORD. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BELFORD. I understand that the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] is to consolidate the Bureau of Construction and Repair with the Bureau of Steam Engineering. That is, that the man who builds your house shall also build the stove and the chimney; that is about the philosophy of the proposition. In my judgment it is designed to make one man a jack of all trades. I took up a New York paper the other day——

Mr. CALKINS. I can not yield to my friend to make a speech; I thought he wanted to ask a question.

Mr. BELFORD. Just let me read this advertisement.

Mr. CALKINS. I can not yield for that. I know the fertility and resources of my friend from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD], who last year took occasion to say that my friend from Kansas and myself had appeared in the rôle of commodores and admirals, when there was not water enough in our respective districts to freshen a mackerel. Recognizing the resources of the gentleman from Colorado, who represents a State of so high an altitude that no one thinks of holding him to a very strict account for what he says, I beg of him to save his shafts for a more propitious time.

Mr. LONG. I would like to ask the gentleman how the fact is in the great private ship-yards—whether these departments are there united under a single head or are kept separate, as the Navy Department undertakes to keep them?

Mr. CALKINS. That inquiry connects itself with a field so wide that I do not care to enter into it. Every ship-yard has its own peculiar manner of carrying on its private business.

I pass now from this question, to which I desired merely to call the attention of the committee, expressing my own belief that the true policy for our Navy is to consolidate these two bureaus. Not knowing the temper of the committee upon this subject, and believing firmly that this step should be taken, I have made these observations so that the committee may look into the question and be prepared to vote upon it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Has not this very proposition to consolidate these bureaus been recently considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs and voted down?

Mr. CALKINS. I believe it was considered by that committee when there was not a full attendance of members, and was voted down by one majority.

I pass now to the next item, which is under the head of "Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting." I shall be very brief in my remarks upon this item. The sum of $700,000 has been reported by the committee as the amount to be appropriated under this head for equipment of vessels. Of this amount it is estimated that $350,000 will be required to buy coal for vessels and $270,000 to purchase the other articles enumerated in the paragraph, such as hemp, wire, hides, and other materials for the manufacture of rope, cordage, &c., leaving but $80,000 for the other expenses under this head. If, in accordance with the policy recommended by the Secretary of the Navy, a great many of our navy-yards are to remain closed, some of them practically abolished, this sum will probably be sufficient. If, however, another policy is to be directed by Congress, the amount will be entirely inadequate to the needs of the service.

Upon the subject of consolidating the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting with the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing I have this to say: The Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting may properly be divided into two heads. Equipment necessarily involves the purchase of various articles for the Navy. I see no reason myself why the purchase of these supplies should not be made by the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing (a bureau which is also engaged largely in buying supplies of different kinds for the Navy). The other head, that of Recruiting, can be consolidated with the Bureau of Navigation, which relates properly to this subject. This would merge that bureau into the two named, and we would thus get rid of a useless bureau, for if the work can be consolidated with that of other bureaus that particular bureau becomes unnecessary. This consolidation would be a matter of economy, would bring the different branches of our naval administration closer together, would involve less machinery, and I believe would be a lasting benefit to the Navy. I shall therefore heartily support such an amendment if it be offered to the bill.

There is on page 12 of the bill a provision with which I am not at all in sympathy. It is a provision which changes existing law and against which I shall at the proper time make a point of order, failing in which I shall move to strike it out. It provides:

> That no part of this sum shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ship when the estimated cost of such repairs, to be appraised by a competent board of naval officers, shall exceed 30 per cent. of the estimated cost, appraised in like manner, of a new ship of the same size and like material.

The present law, Mr. Chairman, provides that when the repairs of a wooden ship would cost more than 20 per cent. of the value of a new vessel of similar character, the work shall not be done. I make this point against the provision in the bill: that if the sum which the bill proposes to appropriate in this item is to remain without increase, it will be insufficient for the repair of these wooden vessels when those repairs may amount to 30 per cent. of the value of a new vessel. Under the provision of the law of last year that these repairs should not exceed 20 per cent. the Navy Department has reported a deficiency; and it is very evident that the appropriation proposed in this bill for this item will not be sufficient when we allow such repairs to the extent of 30 per cent.

Mr. RANDALL. Did I understand the gentleman to say that this provision that repairs should not exceed 20 per cent. was for the years 1883 and 1884?

Mr. CALKINS. No, sir; it applies only to 1884.

Mr. RANDALL. As to 1883 the provision was 30 per cent.

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. Therefore we practically recommend the provision which was adopted for 1883.

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, sir. And I say that when you increase the expenditure under this head from 20 per cent. to 30 per cent., and appropriate only the same amount that was appropriated last year, under which there has been a deficiency, and if this provision is to stand there ought to be appropriated at least $333,000 more for the current year, saying nothing of the deficiency for this year.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether there has been any report made to this Congress as to the number of wooden ships now in Navy which have good sailing qualities or which are fit to be sent upon cruises.

Mr. CALKINS. I will come to that later on.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I think we should recognize the fact that we are slow in building an iron navy. It is going to take years to do it. I think the Committee on Appropriations and the Navy Department had better look to it that wooden vessels are not discarded to-day, when by a little money expended on them they might be made useful as naval vessels for years to come, and certainly until we have an iron navy.

Mr. CALKINS. The next provision of the bill to which I shall call attention is that under the heading of the Bureau of Steam Engineering. There is an appropriation carried in this bill apparently of $750,000, and also a reappropriation of $172,000, which was a part of the appropriation made last year of $1,000,000 for the construction of what is known as the four monitors. I say an apparent appropriation. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that this fiscal year began on the 1st of July, and it is a part of an appropriation of $1,000,000 made last year, and can be expended any time between the 1st of last July and the 1st of next July, unless Congress intervenes to prevent it. I will not evade the question which this presents. Last year there was $1,000,000 appropriated for this year for the purpose of construction, machinery, and ordnance for the four monitors known as the Puritan, the Terror, the Amphitrite, and the Monadnock. The contracts have already been made, to complete them so far as this money will complete them, for the Puritan, the Terror, and the Amphitrite. The contract has not been made for the Monadnock; it required about $30,000 more than this $172,000 to complete or carry into effect the provision of law in reference to these vessels. The Monadnock is a vessel on the Pacific coast at Mare Island navy-yard. This money is sought to be diverted by this bill from the purpose for which it was appropriated and to be put into the general fund for this bureau. If that is done, it will put a stop to the work on the Monadnock. And that is the purpose of it. There is no concealment made about it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the committee, whatever my personal views may be in reference to finishing these four monitors (and their completion will require about three and a half millions more), I am decidedly of the opinion that for the benefit of the Pacific coast the Monadnock ought to be put in as forward a state of completion as the three monitors for the Atlantic coast. I would not divert this $172,000 into the general fund and thereby stop the work on the Monadnock. And when the proper time comes I shall move to strike that provision out of this bill, leaving the Secretary of the Navy $172,000 to proceed with the work on that vessel.

There is also an item in the proviso which changes the existing law and puts the repairs at 30 instead of 20 per cent. This I will test the sense of the committee by moving to strike it out.

I also call attention to the fact that on page 14 of the bill will be found an appropriation of $5,000 for taking care of these monitors when delivered to the Government by the contractors. That means that the monitors shall be laid up and nothing further shall be done to them. At present I express no views on that subject except to say this provision tenders that issue to Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. That same issue was made last Congress, and this House did not vote anything primarily to these monitors.

Mr. CALKINS. In the conference report a million of dollars was agreed upon which did go to the monitors in that appropriation bill.

Mr. RANDALL. But that originated in the Senate. This House was not disposed to make such an appropriation.

Mr. CALKINS. Ah! But I call attention to the fact that it was agreed to, whether made in conference or elsewhere, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania knows that as well as I.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, it is true; but it was given under the compulsion, as the gentleman knows, of a conference report.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman and myself need not get into a dispute about what the compulsion was; I am only stating the fact.

But, Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention now to what strikes me as being a remarkable omission—I say omission, because I can not help but think that it is an omission—in the preparation of this bill. The bill that is reported to the House and upon which we are now acting provides for the finishing of the four steel cruisers authorized to be built by the last Congress. These cruisers will be finished some time during the present year, commencing in August; that is to say, one will be finished in August and the others some time during the year, not later than October or November; and yet this bill, although the Secretary of the Navy recommended that we should make an appropriation of $449,000 to provide for the armament of these vessels this bill contains no appropriation therefor. In other words, it amounts to this, that we will soon have four steel cruisers upon the ocean in the service of this country as war ships carrying no guns. That is the condition so far as this bill is concerned. Of course we have some wooden—well, I said wooden, and I scarcely need change that remark—we have some old guns that we could put on these ships, but they are comparatively worthless to the country and to the Navy, and certainly unfit to be classed as armament for these cruisers. I think, in fact, we might just as well put "Quaker guns" upon them.

Mr. CHACE (from his seat). Oh, no! [Laughter.]

Mr. CALKINS. I did not refer to my friend from Rhode Island in that description. I know he does shoot. [Laughter.]

Upon the subject of the armament of these ships, Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, which I will print with my remarks, and will not take time to read now, as my hour is drawing to a close. I will simply have it printed and ask gentlemen to read it carefully. The Secretary of the Navy in discussing this matter, in response to a letter which I addressed to him asking his views on this subject, put it tersely and very strongly; and says to undertake, after we have started upon the policy of building these steel cruisers and building up a navy, to finish these four vessels and stop right there, and not provide for the building of any more, but cut off the armament of those we have built, is a policy which I believe he characterizes as ludicrous, and I think so too. At the request of several gentlemen around me I will ask the Clerk to read the communication from the Secretary of the Navy which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 11, 1884.

SIR: In response to your request I submit a statement in reference to the necessity for full appropriations for naval ordnance.

The estimates were: To complete the ordnance outfit of the new steel cruisers, $449,027; for steel rifled breech-loading guns for the rearmament of the Navy, $599,400; for the general working appropriation, $180,000; for machine guns, Gatling guns, and magazine rifles for rearmament, and for necessary machine tools for building the new steel guns, $483,210; repairs under the Bureau of Ordnance, $15,800; miscellaneous ordnance items, $3,000; for the torpedo corps, $105,000; making a total of $1,805,437, without including the ordnance outfits of the five monitors, which are estimated at $1,073,000.

The naval appropriation bill, as reported to the House February 8, includes: general ordnance appropriation, $100,000; repairs under the Bureau of Ordnance, $15,000; miscellaneous ordnance items, $3,000; for the torpedo corps, $50,000; or in all, $168,000 to be appropriated instead of $1,805,437 asked for by the Department.

The proposed appropriations are ludicrously feeble and inadequate. In the report of this Department of November 29, 1882, I had the honor to state that "the principal purpose of a large naval establishment being to use cannon, small-arms, and torpedo explosives against public enemies, the question of ordnance is of the first importance;" also, "that with not one modern high-powered cannon in the Navy, and with only eighty-seven guns worth retaining, the importance of action for the procurement of naval ordnance seems apparent if the Navy is to longer survive."

Notwithstanding the obvious truth and force of these propositions, we find in a naval appropriation bill providing for an expenditure during the next fiscal year of $15,000,000 the allowance of only $168,000 for cannon, small-arms, and torpedo explosives, and an entire omission to continue work upon the armament for the new cruisers.

The Department was empowered by the act of March 3, 1883, authorizing the three new steel cruisers and dispatch-boat, "to construct said vessels and procure their armament at a total cost for each not exceeding the amounts estimated by the naval advisory board." The progress that has been made toward procuring this armament of modern high-power guns is stated in a letter dated February 11, 1884, from Commodore Montgomery Sicard, Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, herewith transmitted. The attempt is being made to build in this country all the guns required, and as far as practicable to construct them from forgings also made here, although it has been found necessary to procure some from abroad. If the utmost possible diligence is used the guns will not be ready until two or three months after the new cruisers are to be finished. If, as is now proposed, no appropriation whatever is made for continuing work on the guns during the next fiscal year the ships will be without guns for one or two years after their completion.

The chief of the bureau also states the necessity for the money asked for the modern rearmament of the Navy and the expediency of procuring torpedo-boats.

Very respectfully,

WM. E. CHANDLER,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. W. H. CALKINS,
House of Representatives.

BUREAU OF ORDNANCE, NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, February 11, 1884.

SIR: In the House bill No. 4716, making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, several items of the utmost importance to the Navy are wholly omitted, and I beg leave to call attention to those omissions in the order in which they press for attention.

First. No appropriation whatsoever is made for procuring the armament of the new steel cruisers.

Out of last year's appropriation for these vessels the Department allotted to this bureau $234,000 toward the procurement of the armament, and all this money will be obligated within the present fiscal year (see appended exhibit marked "A"), leaving $449,026.32 needed to complete this armament (as shown by the appended exhibit B).

It is hardly probable that the utmost exertions of this bureau could result in the completion of the armament of the steel cruisers in time for the ships, even if every facility were afforded and all orders could be placed without the least delay.

It has been foreseen from the first that the design and manufacture of the guns and their material would entail more difficulty than that of the ships themselves, and therefore it seems doubly unfortunate that the appropriation for the batteries should be omitted at a time when it is so very much needed.

Of course all the rest of the money for the armament will be imperatively needed during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885.

The bureau also observes that another most important item has been omitted from the bill, viz, $852,610, asked for commencing the general rearmament of the Navy.

It is not enough to arm simply these steel ships with modern ordnance, but the obsolete cannon and material on the ships that carry our flag on the various cruising stations should be changed as soon as possible. At present these ships are at an immense disadvantage as compared with those of foreign nations they meet abroad, and we are bound not to let such a state of things exist a moment longer than is absolutely necessary.

In order that this change of armament may be made quickly, the work must commence as soon as money can be made available for the purchase and manufacture of the guns and material. These orders should be placed within the next fiscal year.

It was estimated that the ordnance mentioned on the appended exhibit C could be procured with this money, and it is only a partial provision for rearmament. It is further observed that the bill omits the item of $55,000 for the purchase of a torpedo-boat. Such boats are absolutely necessary to the national defense. None have as yet been built in this country, and the one asked for was to be purchased abroad and used as a model from which to have others constructed in this country.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

MONTGOMERY SICARD,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. WILLIAM E. CHANDLER,
Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. Of the $1,300,000 which was given last year for the cruisers I find that there was an allotment made by the Secretary of the Navy, and in that allotment I find as follows: for construction, $585,000; for engineering, $377,000; and for ordnance he has allotted the sum of $234,000. I only want this fact to enter into this debate just at that point.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman is entirely welcome to the statement and is entitled to have it incorporated there.

Mr. RANDALL. I do it for the reason that the gentleman stated that there was no provision in this bill for ordnance, and that these vessels when completed would be helpless in that regard; and therefore I incorporate in the debate this statement of the Secretary of the Navy to show that there had been an allotment for that very purpose.

Mr. CALKINS. But I do not understand, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to understand, that that appropriation or allotment of $200,000 set aside, as he states, is sufficient for the purchase of the armament for these vessels.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, there is one gun that will be shortly ready, as I understand it, ready to be tested. But be that as it may, there is an allotment covering the ground.

Mr. CALKINS. That allotment was made, no doubt, and the money expended or is in process of being expended for the purpose indicated——

Mr. RANDALL. Then these cruisers will not be entirely without armament, even if there was no general provision in the bill covering that item.

Mr. CALKINS. But the point I make is this, that taking this allotment of $200,000 set aside for ordnance, it would be entirely insufficient to arm these four vessels; it is not enough to complete the armament; and if we do not make an appropriation to continue it the work must cease and will cease. That is my suggestion.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me ask also what becomes of the guns that are already on the vessels; on our present vessels?

Mr. CALKINS. Oh, I know we have got some old smooth-bore cannon that we can take over the world and pop away with where there is no enemy in sight.

Mr. RANDALL. This country has no enemy in sight.

Mr. CALKINS. But I want to know if my colleague on the committee the gentleman from Pennsylvania contemplates the use of that sort of ordnance on these four steel cruisers.

Mr. RANDALL. I say to-day there is no enemy in sight of this country, and I am not willing to give, as I think unnecessarily, if I can help it, to the present State and Navy Departments any excessive amounts of money.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Chairman, while there is no enemy in sight, I have always been taught that the time to prepare for war is in time of peace. If we had been prepared recently there would not have been the four years' war that swept this country and devastated parts of it in a way from which it has not recovered yet.

Now, as the President has said in his message, the country is enjoying the blessings of unprecedented prosperity, and there never was a time when this country could build a navy with such ease as it can now. There never was a time when the country ought to enter upon the construction of a navy like the present. And I hold it to be a crime against the people of this Government to stop now and refuse to build it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. CALKINS. I can not yield now. On this head I have collected some statistics which I wish to submit to the House and the country. I have collected statistics of the population and the value of the property in the following cities upon our seacoast, namely: Boston, New York, Brooklyn, Portland (Me.), Charleston (S. C.), Mobile, New Orleans, and Galveston, on the Atlantic; San Francisco, Oakland, Portland (Oreg.), on the Pacific. These statistics are as follows:

	Population in 1880.	Taxable valuation in 1880.
Boston	362,839	$658,220,784
New York	1,206,299	1,094,069,335
Brooklyn	566,663	244,556,977
Portland, Me	33,810	51,530,510
Charleston	49,984	27,994,055
Mobile	32,034	16,538,487
New Orleans	216,090	91,794,350
Galveston	22,248	15,530,784
San Francisco	233,959	244,626,760
Oakland	34,555	42,822,877
Portland, Oreg	25,203	11,511,058
Total	2,783,684	2,499,195,977

The number of people in those cities amounts to nearly 3,000,000. The value of the property for taxation, as reported in 1880, amounts in round numbers to $2,500,000,000. And yet the little country of Chili in three weeks' time could take every one of those cities and destroy this immense property. Why do I say that? If you look into the navy register of that country you will find they have got five armored vessels. We have not a vessel in our Navy that could stand before one of those armored vessels ten minutes, and every one knows it. No, sir; put them all together, put the entire thirty vessels that we have afloat in front of one of these vessels of the little country of Chili, and she would sink every one of them within less space than we occupy in debate here on this bill, And yet, while I grant you we are not in the presence of an enemy, the fact remains that this country has pocketed insults not only from that little country of Chili, but from almost every other country on the face of the globe in the last four or five years, because we have no Navy with which to assert our rights or maintain our national dignity.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether the construction of these steel cruisers is with any purpose to make them fighting vessels; whether they are not intended as cruisers to prey upon the enemy's commerce?

Mr. CALKINS. That is true.

Mr. RANDALL. To fight and to have the requisite speed if necessary to get away.

Mr. CALKINS. I admit these steel cruisers can not stand against the heavy armored vessels that are owned by Italy, Germany, France, England, or any of the first-class naval powers. But it is a start in the right direction. That is what I say. And it is just as necessary that we should have a navy that will prey upon the commerce of other nations if we should be at war with them as to have vessels that are fighters.

Mr. RANDALL. I want quietly there to make a remark, that this side of the House is not responsible for not having built up a navy in this country while the other side have been in power during the last twenty years.

Mr. CALKINS. You have been in power in this House since 1874 except during one Congress, and I have not seen you start in that direction since you have been in power. We tried it, and when these monitors were undertaken to be built by an administration friendly to this side of the House there was an outcry against them. It is true, also, Mr. Chairman, that since those monitors were begun the time for that class of vessels has almost passed. Now, while we have been spending a few millions of dollars in experiments, England spent five hundred millions of dollars in building her vessels and in experimenting. Many of the vessels she built, after spending millions of dollars upon them, were worthless.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman give us his authority for that statement as to the five hundred millions of dollars?

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, sir. But I do not have it at hand at this moment.

Mr. RANDALL. Very well; any other time.

Mr. CALKINS. The statement is that England spent £100,000,000 sterling, and if that is not quite $500,000,000 it is very near it. That is the amount which England since the close of the war has been spending and experimenting with on her navy. That is the statement I make, and I stand upon it.

But, Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, I have no doubt that this Congress will shut its eyes to the necessity of building a navy, as other Congresses in which I have served have done, and will absolutely refuse to give effect to any suggestions of the Navy Department to build further steel cruisers.

I have, however, an amendment which I have prepared, and which at the proper time I shall offer to this bill. It proposes to continue the construction of these steel cruisers and to provide for the building of more of them. That is about all that I want to say on that head.

I now come to the proposed reduction by this bill of the number of officers in the Marine Corps to seventy-five from the present number, eighty-three. On that subject I call attention to a memorandum furnished from the Navy Department:

Memorandum on the proposed reduction in the naval appropriation bill of the United States Marine Corps to seventy-five officers on the active-list.

There are at present seventy-eight line and five staff officers, making a total of eighty-three.

In the last naval appropriation bill Congress provided for eighty-five, including the staff. Excluding the five staff officers, whose duties are special and continuous, there are but seventy-eight officers to perform all duties from commandant down to second lieutenant.

Of these there are forty at the several garrisons and stations on shore and thirty-three on board ships in commission. One captain is on duty as Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy, one officer is on leave of absence, and three off duty sick, making the whole number of seventy-eight line officers.

The accompanying paper, marked "B," shows the proper number of officers required for the shore stations and vessels in commission, as approved by the Navy Department. As this requires eighty-eight line officers, it is evident that no reduction should be made, but that the number should be increased to that provided in the act of July 25, 1861, in section 1596, Revised Statutes, namely, ninety-three line and staff, this being the least number with which the duties required can be properly performed.

The act of June 30, 1875, was carried out, and experience has shown that the number provided by it, namely, seventy-five, will not suffice.

Why renew such legislation? It is false economy to cut down below what is actually needed. Troops must have officers, and for years past there have not been enough at some of the stations to enforce discipline, and many ships have been without officers to command the guards.

No argument as to a surplus of officers in the Navy can be applied to the Marine Corps, which has labored under the opposite disadvantage of not having enough.

The proposed reduction would leave but twelve second lieutenants for 2,000 men. Reference to the paper marked "B" will show how many are required in the Army for the same number.

There are always some officers unfit for duty by reason of sickness. No allowance is made for this in the proposed reduction. At present three are sick for long periods, two of whom are past recovery.

The duties of the five staff officers are always the same, but those of the line vary greatly. The men are divided into many detachments, both large and small, and are scattered over the globe, requiring in consequence more officers than if permanently stationed as regular companies or regiments on shore.

A reference to the accompanying paper marked "A" will show the duties of the Marine Corps and the opinion entertained by the Navy Department and many distinguished officers of its value and efficiency.

Its history from its beginning has been one of honorable and faithful service in all our wars "by land and sea," and it well merits its appellation of "ever faithful."

I now come to the proposed reduction of the officers of the Navy. For years there has been a constant tinkering with the officers of the Navy, both of the line and of the staff. There is a feeling of unrest, of discontent and uncertainty, among those officers all the time. One Congress convenes and declares one policy, and the next Congress comes along and overturns it, and so we have been going on for years. In order to get before the committee an important fact I call attention to a tabulated statement which I hold in my hand, which has been furnished from a trustworthy source, as I understand it. It is as follows:

It will be seen from the inspection of the foregoing tables that the number of officers of the line in 1842 was 1,084, and that the Navy Register last published shows an exhibit of only 799, a reduction of 285.

It will be seen by an inspection of this statement that there were more officers of the line in the Navy in 1842 than there are to-day. The total number of officers of the line in 1842 was 1,084, and in 1884 the total number is 799, a reduction of 285 officers of the line. The staff has increased by two or three hundred officers.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman the source of that information?

Mr. CALKINS. This statement was prepared by a friend of mine, a naval officer, whose name I do not care to give.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Allow me to ask the gentleman if there is not a contest going on between the line and the staff, and whether it would not be well enough to have a statement from other sources than the line of the Navy?

Mr. CALKINS. If there be a conflict between the line and the staff I do not care to take part in it. All I have to say is that the officers of the line of the Navy are the men who do our fighting, the men who bear our flag wherever the white sails of commerce go. They are the men in the Navy of all others who ought, in my judgment, to receive favorable action at our hands.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Are not the staff officers exposed to the same dangers under all circumstances?

Mr. CALKINS. Oh, no; some of them are on vessels, but the most of them are on shore. I have said all that I care to say upon this appropriation bill at this time. I have spoken warmly about some portions of it, because I believe that if the Government of the United States ever wants to restore its merchant marine, to compete with other nations of the world, it must first build a navy.

It was stated not long ago, and I think very probably the statement was correct, although I have not had an opportunity to verify it, that the great profits which had been made by England in her commerce have been made from the semi-civilized countries with which she trades. Admiral Shufeldt stated the other day in his testimony before a committee of the Senate that it was a fact that before you can establish commerce with such nations you must first take there your men-of-war and your guns, and let them know that there is power behind the Government which those vessels represent ready to enforce the rights of American citizens abroad; a statement which I think no one will deny. If we are ever to re-establish the merchant marine of this country the first thing to do is to construct a navy. Having constructed a navy, I think it will not be long before our flag will again float at the mast-heads of one of the first marine countries of the world.

Mr. HEPBURN. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is in reference to the Pay Department of the Navy. I can not ascertain from the Book of Estimates the amount paid to the pay officers of the Navy. Can the gentleman state the cost of that department exclusive of the pay proper of the officers? I mean such items as clerk-hire, rent, and incidentals of that kind.

Mr. CALKINS. By law every paymaster in the Navy is entitled to a clerk. On page 4 of this bill will be found an appropriation for the pay of those clerks. It is not segregated, but is made in one grand total. Without looking up the law fixing the compensation of those clerks I could not now answer the question of the gentleman. Their compensation, however, is fixed by law.

I want to say further to my friend that my judgment is that this is the proper time to commence cutting down the number of officers of that department. For instance, there are thirteen pay directors and twelve pay inspectors. Those officers have too much rank to permit their going to sea in a vessel, because they would rank the commanding officer of the vessel; and there are not enough vessels in the Navy to enable us to send them out in fleets where the commander of the fleet would rank them. They are consequently kept on shore. My judgment is that each grade should be reduced to five in number and there kept.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] has expired. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. THOMAS. I gladly do so.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the SPEAKER having resumed the chair, Mr. CONVERSE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

IMPROVEMENTS IN ASTRONOMICAL OBSERVATORIES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit a communication, under date of the 8th instant, addressed to me by the Secretary of the Navy, covering a report of Professor Simon Newcomb, United States Navy, on the subject of recent improvements in astronomical observatories, instruments, and methods of observations, as noted during his visit to the principal observatories of Europe in the year 1883, made in pursuance of orders of the Navy Department.

The request of the Secretary is commended to the consideration of Congress.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 11, 1884.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 24) authorizing the printing of 2,500 extra copies of the report of the health officer of the District of Columbia.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions.

SAINT PAUL AND SIOUX CITY RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. WAKEFIELD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands:

Whereas the Congress of the United States by act of March 3, 1857, granted certain lands to the Territory and future State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of certain lines of railroad therein named; and

Whereas by the provisions of said act there were granted to aid in the construction of a railroad from Saint Paul and Saint Anthony via Minneapolis to the southern boundary of said Territory, in the direction of the mouth of the Big Sioux River, every alternate section of land designated by odd numbers for six sections in width on each side of said road; and

Whereas it was stipulated in said act that should it appear when the line of said road was definitely fixed that the United States had sold any part of said granted land, or that the right of pre-emption had attached to the same or any part thereof, then it should be lawful for the Territory or future State, acting through the designated authority, to select, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, from the lands of the United States nearest to the tier of sections heretofore specified, so much land in alternate sections or parts of sections as should be equal to such lands as the United States had sold or otherwise appropriated or to which the right of pre-emption had attached, which lands thus selected, together with those granted by said act, were to be held by the Territory and future State of Minnesota for the uses and purposes hereinbefore stated: Provided, however, That the land so located should in no instance be more than fifteen miles from the line of said road; and

Whereas the State of Minnesota, by legislative act approved March 4, 1864, granted to the Minnesota Valley Railroad Company, now known as the Saint Paul and Sioux City Railroad Company, all the lands, interests, rights, powers, and privileges granted to and conferred upon said State by said act of Congress of March 3, 1857, and the said railroad company constructed a railway from Saint Paul to the southern boundary of the State, in the direction of the mouth of the Big Sioux River, as by said act provided; and

Whereas by an act of Congress approved May 12, 1864, four additional sections per mile were granted to said State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of said road, subject to the same conditions and restrictions as obtained in the original grant; and

Whereas the right of said State to select lands in lieu of those sold or otherwise appropriated by the United States, or to which pre-emption rights had attached, was limited by the terms of the grant to lands conterminous with the constructed line; and

Whereas it is alleged that under an erroneous and unwarranted construction by a former Secretary of the Interior of the acts referred to there were certified by the Interior Department to the said State of Minnesota in trust for the said The Saint Paul and Sioux City Railroad Company large tracts of valuable land, aggregating many thousands of acres, which were selected by the agents of said company in the counties of Jackson, Nobles, and Rock, in said State, at a distance of from fifty to one hundred and fifty miles from that portion of their constructed line within whose prescribed limits the deficiencies mentioned were found to exist at the date of location: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the House of Representatives at an early day by what authority and under what law the said The Saint Paul and Sioux City Railroad Company were allowed to acquire title to lands in said counties of Jackson, Nobles, and Rock to make good deficiencies found to exist within the limits of their grant between Saint Paul and the city of Mankato, in Blue Earth County, of said State.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COKE. I present a petition of many citizens of El Paso, Tex., addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, praying for the establishment at El Paso of a United States district court with circuit court jurisdiction and powers. The petition is accompanied by a mass of pertinent statistical information showing the importance of the establishment of such a court. The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mahlon C. Frambes and others, owners of the schooner T. P. Lerned, praying compensation for the loss of that vessel in Hatteras Inlet, North Carolina, January, 1862, while in the service of the Government, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. BOWEN. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report that all papers which accompanied the bill (S. 563) for the relief of John Little and Hobart Williams have been referred to the Court of Claims. The bill is returned to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be placed on file.

Mr. FAIR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 70) for the relief of Joseph M. Cumming, Hamilton J. Miller, and William McRoberts, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 483) for the relief of the State of Nebraska, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The bill can be placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the indefinite postponement of the bill?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I object to its indefinite postponement at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1053) for the relief of William Pfaender, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PALMER. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to make the following report:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of Belva A. Lockwood and others, praying that a woman deputy warden be appointed to the jail of the District of Columbia, report:

That the committee find the power to make such appointment is vested by law in the chief-justice of the District and the warden of the jail.

That while the committee would not at present recommend any legislation in the premises, they are unanimously of the opinion that an ordinary regard for the proprieties of life demand that such appointment be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 86) for the relief of L. Madison Day, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

E. H. GEORGE AND H. W. WALKER.

Mr. PIKE. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 152) for the relief of E. H. George and H. W. Walker, to report it favorably, without amendment; and I ask unanimous consent that it be put on its passage.

The joint resolution was read; and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to E. H. George $125 and to H. W. Walker $250 in full compensation for services rendered by them in closing and opening new books in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives and preparing mileage reports for payment.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LADY FRANKLIN BAY EXPEDITION.

Mr. HALE. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 50) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions, to report it adversely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the joint resolution be indefinitely postponed?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not know but that this would be as good a time as any to obtain the sentiment of the Senate on this measure. It is well known that by the joint resolution recently passed the President or his Cabinet officers are given full privilege to expend as much money as he pleases, and if any action is to be taken at all on this measure it should be immediately following that act. I suppose under the rules the question now comes up on the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule debate or action upon a bill just reported can only be had by unanimous consent. It is usual with adverse reports, where there is no difference of opinion among Senators, to keep them off the Calendar by indefinitely postponing the bills to which they relate.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I wish to say but a few words upon the question. I discovered that there was a sentiment in the Senate very largely in favor, as I thought, of limiting the appropriation to a certain sum, and although it was not incorporated in the original joint resolution for some reason or other which I can not fully understand, I immediately followed that measure by the one now before the Senate providing for a fixed limit to the appropriation.

I am willing that a vote shall be taken upon the joint resolution now reported. The Senate fully understands the question. If it is indefinitely postponed, of course the appropriation will not be limited. If the Senate should not indefinitely postpone this resolution, I shall then ask unanimous consent that it may be immediately considered, in order that the Secretary of the Navy may be advised, and fully advised, to make no greater expenditure than the pending joint resolution provides shall be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the joint resolution be now considered. Is there objection?

Mr. HALE. I do not think it had better be considered now. I supposed, from what I heard of the remarks made by the Senator from New Jersey, that he proposed simply to take the sense of the Senate on indefinitely postponing it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question on indefinite postponement, except by unanimous consent, can only be taken as if the resolution were before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and if the Senate refuse to indefinitely postpone it it will then be before the Senate for action.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to the sense of the Senate being taken without further debate upon postponing it indefinitely, simply saying that that was decisively settled the other day by the Senate, and I do not think the body will want to take it up again. We clearly shall gain nothing from the House by sending this bill over there. The matter is out of the way, and perhaps pretty well out of the way, and I hope the Senate will not reopen it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? The Chair hears none; and it is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It will be reported at length.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the sum of $500,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and immediately available, to carry into effect the provisions of House of Representatives joint resolution numbered 119; and that the expenditure therein authorized to be made shall be limited to said $500,000.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I will only say one word——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the question. Does the Senator from Maine move that the joint resolution be indefinitely postponed?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the joint resolution be indefinitely postponed. The question is, Will the Senate agree to that motion? The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I will only make the statement that I have information from responsible sources that the amount to which this resolution limits the appropriation, namely $500,000, will be even more than will be needed to carry into effect the joint resolution passed the other day. I hope this measure will not be indefinitely postponed. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE. Let us have a vote and get it out of the way.

Mr. GARLAND. Let the joint resolution which was passed be read. This appears to be in the nature of a supplement to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution which was passed will be read for the information of the Senate, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to prepare and dispatch an expedition to the coast of Greenland, Smith's Sound, or Lady Franklin Bay for the purpose of relieving and bringing home Lieut. A. W. Greely and party; and that for this purpose the purchase of not exceeding three vessels is authorized, and all expenditures necessary for manning, equipping, and supplying them, and for any land journeys which may be required; and such sums as may be necessary to effect the object of this resolution are hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; the vessels purchased to be sold after their return, and the money arising from such sale covered into the Treasury. And the President shall submit to Congress, on the first Monday of December, 1884, a full and detailed account of all expenditures and outlays made on account of this appropriation.

Mr. GARLAND. Now let the pending measure be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending joint resolution will be reported for information.

The Chief Clerk again read the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the joint resolution be indefinitely postponed?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I call attention to the phraseology of the joint resolution. In line 5, after the word "appropriated," the word "and" should be stricken out and "to be" inserted; so as to read, "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not receive the amendment on a motion to indefinitely postpone. If the motion to postpone indefinitely be not agreed to the amendment will then be in order. The question is on agreeing to the motion to indefinitely postpone the joint resolution.

Mr. MCPHERSON. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary called the roll.

Mr. HALE. My colleague [Mr. FRYE] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Allison,	Dolph,	Manderson,	Platt,
Anthony,	Hale,	Miller of Cal.,	Riddleberger,
Bowen,	Harrison,	Mitchell,	Sawyer,

So the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY BUILDING.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to ask unanimous consent to correct a single word that was misprinted in the bill that passed yesterday in relation to the Library. In line 7 of section 1, after the word "street," I wish to have the word "south" inserted.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the bill has gone to the House.

Mr. MORRILL. No, it has not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still in the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. It is merely desired to correct a misprint in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that an error in a name in Senate bill No. 1139, which passed the Senate yesterday, may be corrected, by inserting the word "south" in line 7 of section 1 after the word "street," so as to read: "or between B street south and East Capitol street." Is there objection to the correction of the bill in the particular stated? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered, and it will be so engrossed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1514) for the relief of Bessie S. Gilmore; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1515) granting a pension to Beverly Post; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FARLEY introduced a bill (S. 1516) for the relief of Jesse D. Carr; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. BECK, it was Ordered, That Jabez Burchard have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate his petition and papers, subject to the rules.

On motion of Mr. CAMDEN, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to Senate bill No. 797 donating certain public building for free-school purposes in the town of Harper's Ferry, W. Va., on file in the office of the Secretary of Senate, be withdrawn.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the following order:

Ordered, That the papers relating to the claims of Richard H. Porter and C. A. Perry & Co. be taken from the files of the Secretary and referred to the Committee on Claims as exhibits touching Senate bill 1391, referring to the Court of Claims the claims for property seized by General Johnston on the Utah expedition.

I am advised by a reputable attorney of this city who is representing the claimants that these exhibits are competent evidence and are necessary in the consideration of the bill, although they have been filed in other cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be entered subject to the rule, if there be no objection.

TELEGRAPHIC-SERVICE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. HILL. I submit the following resolution and ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the necessary expenses incurred under resolutions of the Senate of January 31 and February 11, 1884, be paid out of the appropriation "for expenses of special and select committees," &c., on vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule requires that if objection be made such a resolution shall be referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear some explanation of it.

Mr. GARLAND. Let it go over for the present.

Mr. HILL. I did not understand the Chair clearly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is calling for objection, and stating that under the rules if objection be made to the consideration of a resolution appropriating money out of the contingent fund of the Senate it shall be referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses. The Chair understands that objection is made. The resolution will lie over until to-morrow, unless the Senator from Colorado desires it to be referred.

Mr. HILL. Let it lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not make any objection; I said that I should like to hear an explanation before voting on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] objected, the Chair understood.

Mr. GARLAND. Yes; let the resolution go to the committee.

Mr. HILL. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Colorado to be willing that the resolution shall be referred.

Mr. HILL. I have no objection to its being referred. I suppose it will be acted on very promptly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. MAXEY. In order that the Committee on Contingent Expenses may understand the resolution offered by the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, I wish merely to say that the entire postal-telegraph system is now before that committee, and the committee believe it wise to get the best testimony they can. Hence the resolution was introduced for the purpose of obtaining the evidence on that subject.

PRIVATE RELIEF BILLS.

Mr. DOLPH. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and it is hereby, directed to consider and report to the Senate upon the power and expediency of restricting, by the rules of the Senate, the introduction of bills for private relief to bills reported by a committee of the Senate, and to cases where a petition for relief shall have been first presented to the Senate, referred to a committee, and the introduction of a bill for the relief prayed for recommended by the committee.

With the indulgence of the Senate I will briefly explain the resolution, and I may safely say that the suggestions made by me will voice the sentiment of every Senator who has ever served upon the committee on Claims, the Committee on Pensions, or any other committee of the Senate to which any considerable number of bills for private relief have been referred.

I am told upon good authority that at the close of the first session of the Thirty-seventh Congress there had been but four hundred bills introduced in the Senate, and that probably the number introduced during both sessions of that Congress did not exceed six hundred. The number of the last bill introduced in the Senate yesterday was 1513, and yet but a little over two months of the session have expired. Of these bills I think it is safe to estimate that at least 1,300 are for private relief. Such bills are mainly referred to the Committee on Claims, the Committee on Pensions, the Committee on Private Land Claims, the Committee on Military Affairs, &c. The number of bills which was referred to the Committee on Claims in the Forty-seventh Congress was six hundred and twenty-five. Of these there were reported one hundred and fifty-six, and no action was had upon four hundred and sixty-nine. They were probably considered in the order in which they were referred to the committee, and however meritorious any one of the four hundred and sixty-nine bills for relief not acted upon by reason of that committee being overwhelmed with these bills, its merits could not be considered.

At the present session there have been 425 bills referred to the Committee on Claims; reported at this session 87; not acted upon at this time 338. When it is considered that of these 87 reports many of them are voluminous, consisting of 15 or 20 pages of closely printed matter; that in many of the claims so referred to the committee the testimony is voluminous, in some cases amounting to 5,000 pages, and in many other cases so voluminous that it would occupy the time of a subcommittee for an entire day to examine it, being almost entirely ex parte, material and immaterial, relevant and irrelevant, it will be seen at once how great a burden is imposed upon the committees of Congress by the now indiscriminate right of introducing bills for private relief.

I imagine that the people of this country suppose that Congress is engaged in considering legislation of national importance—matters the power to legislate upon which is conferred upon Congress under the provisions of the Constitution; but the contrary is true. Congress has been converted into a great judicial tribunal, to which every man who conceives that he has a claim against the Government is allowed to come, have his bill introduced, and have it sent to a committee of Congress, and the time of the committee is consumed in examining the claim and the proofs submitted and in preparing a report upon the facts and the law of the case.

Some relief has been given by the act of March 3, 1883, which provided—

That whenever a claim or matter is pending before any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, or before either House of Congress, which involves the investigation and determination of facts, the committee or House may cause the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims of the United States, and the same shall there be proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt.

But this is only partial relief. Every claim must be critically examined before the committee can determine whether it is a proper one to be transmitted to the Court of Claims for the purpose of having the facts found, and after it is returned to Congress it must still be acted upon.

There is another evil of this system. Notwithstanding the rule of the Senate which provides that claims shall not, after an adverse report has been made, be reconsidered unless further testimony is produced, in almost every case further testimony is produced, and it is impossible to finally kill one of these claims. Some of the claims now before the Committee on Claims are found to have been before Congress for a quarter of a century, and I do not know but some of them have been here for half a century; they are presented to every Congress, adverse reports are made upon them, and at every session they occupy a portion of the time of Congress.

If they are so fortunate as to be made the subjects of bills and to be among the first introduced into Congress and referred to a committee, they ordinarily take their places on the Calendar in the order of their introduction, and are the first to be considered by the committees and by Congress.

It is high time, I think, that there was some remedy for this evil. If the number of bills which are introduced into Congress for private relief goes on increasing, it will be impossible for Congress to give its attention to anything of public importance.

This measure proposed by me is a step in this direction. If it be competent to limit the introduction of private bills by a rule of the Senate, I think it should be done; and if not, further legislation should be had by which some tribunal shall be created to hear and determine these questions of private right, in order that Congress may be relieved from the great burden which is now placed upon it by the indiscriminate presentation of claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution offered by the Senator from Oregon will be reported at the desk.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ROOMS FOR COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAWES. I understand there are now six committees of this body who have no room in which they can meet inside of the Capitol. In order to bring the matter to the attention of the proper authorities I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Architect of the Capitol be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to rent and prepare suitable rooms outside of the Capitol for the use of such Senate committees as have no rooms, and that all expenses hereunder be paid out of the fund for the contingent expenses of the Senate, subject to the approval of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Perhaps it had better be referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It must be referred under the rule, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAWES. It will bring the matter before the Senate just as well to have it referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer a resolution, and ask not for its present consideration but that it lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that the Northern Pacific Railroad Company has selected in lieu of lands claimed to have been lost to said company within the "granted limits" established by the act of July 2, 1864 (13 Statutes, 365), lands within the ten-mile indemnity limits circumscribed by said act, which said lands so selected were occupied by homestead and pre-emption settlers at the time the line of said road was definitely fixed, namely, October 4, 1880, and also at the date of such selections; and

Whereas it is alleged that the withdrawal from sale and settlement of the odd-numbered sections within said indemnity limits on the 4th day of October, 1880, by the Secretary of the Interior was unwarranted by the act of July 2, 1864, or by any of the acts or resolutions amendatory thereof, and that said odd-numbered sections were subject to entry under the public-land laws of the United States until the date of actual selection by said corporation: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to withhold his approval of the selections made within the indemnity limits as aforesaid, and to suspend all action thereon until Congress shall determine the questions involved in the claims of settlers upon the lands so selected by said corporation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed and lie over until to-morrow at the suggestion of the Senator introducing it.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is what I desire.

JOHN THORNS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate under the eighth rule Order of Business No. 58, which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 167) for the relief of John Thorns.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill was reported adversely from the Committee on Claims. It is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I object to its consideration.

Mr. INGALLS. What became of the bill under debate when the morning business was closed yesterday afternoon?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was under debate when the Senate went into executive session, the Chair understands, and is the unfinished business, and will therefore come up at 2 o'clock. Order of Business No. 58, being objected to, goes over. Order of Business No. 59 is next in order.

ALBERT H. EMERY.

The bill (S. 399) for the relief of Albert H. Emery was read. It provides for the payment to Albert H. Emery, of New York, of $200,000, in full settlement of all claims, legal or equitable, which he has in any way against the United States on account of the cost of, and the time spent by him and use of, all patents and inventions in designing and constructing the testing-machine built and erected by him for the United States, or otherwise, in any way, on account of that machine. The machine, together with the full right to the use therein of all patents and inventions used in its design and construction, shall belong to the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is a report in that case. I am not sure as to the length of it. I will look and see.

Mr. INGALLS. There is a report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the report submitted by Mr. MANDERSON on the 16th of January from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PLUMB. I object to the consideration of the bill under the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The Senator from Kansas objects to the consideration of the bill. The next bill will be stated.

SONE AND FLEMING MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

The bill (S. 410) for the relief of the Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company, limited, of the city of New York, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to the Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company, limited, of the city of New York, of $5,265.73, being the amount of drawback of duties due to them on certain tin cans exported by them, but which were not entered for drawback within the time fixed by law, owing to the embezzlement of the drawback fees by their dishonest clerk.

Mr. INGALLS. Let us hear the report read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. MANDERSON January 16, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 410) for the relief of the Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company, limited, of the city of New York, having duly considered the same, make the following report:

The claim upon which this bill is based was considered by the Committee on Claims of the Senate at the Forty-seventh Congress, first session, and said committee, on February 18, 1882, made a full and clear report in favor of the allowance of the claim in the following words:

"[Senate Report No. 177, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

"FEBRUARY 15, 1882.—Ordered to be printed.

"Mr. Teller, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following report, to accompany bill S. 31:

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 31) for the relief of the 'Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company, limited,' of the city of New York, having duly considered the same, make the following report:

"That the Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company were refiners and exporters of petroleum during the years 1876-'77, carrying on their business at the city of New York, and it appears from the evidence that it was their habit to pack the oil for exportation in cans manufactured from imported tin. At the time of the exportation, under the provisions of section 3019 United States Revised Statutes, they were entitled to the drawback duties on said imported tin; but in order to obtain this drawback it was necessary to enter the tin for drawback.

"The Sone and Fleming Company had at that time in their employ a clerk whose duty it was to file these drawback notices in the New York custom-house and to pay the small fee required for its entry. It appears from the evidence that the clerk so employed had long attended to his duties faithfully, ingratiating himself into the confidence of the company. During a term of about three months the clerk drew the notices, had them verified by the treasurer of the company, and obtained the several amounts from the cashier of the company necessary to pay these small fees, then left the office for the express purpose of filing the notices of drawback and to pay the fees of the same, but he never filed the notices and he embezzled the fees.

"The collector, in a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, says 'the exporters called at this office, as customary, to sign the bonds,' but inasmuch as their clerk had never filed the entry papers and never paid the fees, no bond had been given. Immediately upon the discovery of these facts the company applied to the collector for relief, and the matter was referred to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary held that his power in the premises was limited by section 3037 of the United States Revised Statutes to such cases as have been 'entered' for drawback and some subsequent formality has been omitted, while in this case the clerk did not file the notices of entry, and that there was no law which empowered the Secretary of the Treasury to authorize the payment of the drawback money. The original landing certificates, signed by the United States consul or vice-consul at the several ports of landing, are in evidence, covering the fourteen lots of tin cans, also the original entry certificates drawn by the company. The amount of the drawback duties which under the Revised Statutes the company was entitled to is $5,265.73.

"Congress has considered it appropriate to give relief in similar cases in several instances. (See page 467, chapter 231, first session Forty-fourth Congress, appendix July 25, 1876; page 437, chapter 124, first session Forty-fourth Congress, appendix June 12, 1876; page 529, chapter 112, second session Forty-fifth Congress, appendix May 25, 1878.)

"The bill provides for the payment of money by the Government to the claimants which fairly belongs to them. The evidence is clear that the Government is to-day in possession of the money by a mere technicality of the law. The high standing of this company is mentioned in the letter of the collector of the port at that time—Mr. Arthur—to the Secretary of the Treasury, on file with the papers, and it seems hard that they should lose so large an amount on account of the embezzlement of a few dollars of their own money by a long-trusted clerk.

"Your committee are of the opinion that the money of the company at present withheld from them on account of their failure to file drawback notices justly belongs to them, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment: Strike out, in line 7, the words 'in gold coin of the United States,' and, in lines 7 and 8, strike out the words 'in currency.'"

Your committee fully concur in the statements and conclusions of the above-quoted report, and do therefore recommend that the claim be allowed, and the passage of the bill (S. 410) without amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest to the Senator who reported this bill the propriety of striking out that clause relating to the embezzlement of drawback fees by a dishonest clerk. That is a matter of history rather than of legislation, and it ought not to be incorporated in the statutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator propose an amendment?

Mr. INGALLS. I will offer as an amendment to strike out that clause.

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

Owing to the embezzlement of the drawback fees by their dishonest clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to strike out the words which have been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN LEATHERS.

The bill (S. 253) for the relief of John Leathers was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a report.

Mr. INGALLS. Let us hear the report read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. DOLPH January 16, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 253) for the relief of John Leathers, having considered the same and accompanying papers, submit the following report:

A bill identical with the present bill was referred to, considered, and reported by this committee to the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress. (Report No. 676.) The facts are correctly stated in that report, which is as follows:

"The record shows that on the 6th day of February, A. D. 1879, John Leathers was duly indicted by the grand jury of the United States for the district of Nevada, under the Revised Statutes of the United States, 'of fishing within an Indian reservation, to wit, in Pyramid Lake, in the State of Nevada;' that on the 1st day of July, same year, he was regularly convicted by a trial jury in the district court of the United States for the district aforesaid of said offense, and was sentenced to pay a fine and costs, amounting to $744.90, which amount was covered into the Treasury of the United States by miscellaneous warrant No. 1397, first quarter 1881; that immediately thereafter the pardon of said John Leathers was recommended by the district attorney and the judge for the district of Nevada; for which transgression the President of the United States granted to him, on the 28th day of February, 1881, a full and unconditional pardon.

"The effect of a pardon upon the condition and rights of its recipient is established by the following decision, from which extracts are given:

"Case of Osborn v. The United. United States Reports Supreme Court, Otto (volume 1, pages 474, 475, 476, 477, and 478).

* * * * * * * *

"A pardon by the President restores to its recipient all rights of property lost by the offense pardoned. * * * The pardon of that offense necessarily carried with it the release of the penalty attached to its commission. * * * It is of the very essence of a pardon that it releases the offender from the consequences of his offense. * * * The penalty of forfeiture annexed to the commission of the offense must fall with the pardon of the offense itself, provided the full operation of the pardon be not restrained by the condition upon which it is granted. * * * The pardon, in releasing the offense, obliterating it in legal contemplation (Carlisle v. United States, 16 Wallace, 151), removes the ground of the forfeiture upon which the decree rests. * * * But, were this otherwise, the constitutional grant to the President of the power to pardon offenses must be held to carry with it, as an incident, the power to release penalties and forfeitures which accrue from the offenses.

* * * * * * * *

"Without authorization by Congress the President has no power to render to the claimant the moneys derived on account of 'fine and costs in case of United States v. John Leathers.' There was no penalty attached other than the fine, which was paid. There was no imprisonment attached and no penalty not executed; therefore the pardon could only act upon the original conviction, vacating it, and this necessarily carried with it a remission of the penalty.

"Your committee are of opinion that owing to the slightness of the offense, and the offender being released by a full and unconditional pardon, relief should be granted to the extent of remitting the fine but not the costs, and your committee hereby report back said bill with the recommendation that it do pass as amended."

The petition for pardon appears to have been forwarded to the Attorney-General by the United States attorney for the district of Nevada, with favorable recommendation, July 25, 1879, less than a month after the conviction.

The pardon was granted February 28, 1881. The granting of the pardon appears to have been a proper exercise of executive clemency, but it came too late to avail the claimant, as before it was granted he had been compelled to pay into court the amount of the fine and costs, $744.90. Although the effect of a pardon by the President may be to remit a pecuniary penalty accruing to the United States, yet if the penalty has been paid and the money actually came into the Treasury of the United States it can not be drawn therefrom without appropriation by act of Congress. (8 Opinions Attorneys-General, 281.)

The United States attorney recommended the granting of the pardon upon condition that the claimant should pay the costs of the prosecution.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the words "seven hundred and forty-four dollars and ninety cents" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "five hundred and one dollars," being the amount of the fine, and that the bill do pass when so amended.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 5, to strike out "seven," before "hundred," and insert "five;" in the same line, before the word "dollars," to strike out "forty-four" and insert "one;" after "dollars" to strike out "and ninety cents;" and in line 8, after the word "five," to strike out "and costs;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to refund to John Leathers the sum of $501, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, on account of said amount having been paid by said John Leathers as a fine for trespassing upon an Indian reservation, for which transgression the President of the United States granted said John Leathers a full and unconditional pardon.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Oregon who reported the bill whether the pardon of which the report speaks was granted on account of error in the proceedings or merely as an act of clemency and grace on the part of the Executive?

Mr. DOLPH. I will answer the Senator from Kansas by saying that it was a mere matter of grace on the part of the Executive, although it was a case that appealed very strongly for executive clemency.

As I recollect the circumstances, the case was about this: There had been an Indian reservation surveyed, and the Indian agent had gone upon the ground and placed stakes to indicate where the line of the reservation ran. There was a lake upon that reservation which, if the true line was as it was staked out by the agent, would be partly within and partly without the reservation, but the actual line of the reservation was found to include the lake entirely within its boundaries.

There is a statute that makes it an offense punishable by fine and imprisonment to fish upon an Indian reservation. A controversy had arisen between the settlers in the neighborhood of this lake and the Indian agent in charge of the reservation in regard to the right to fish in this lake, and this man Leathers, with several others, went openly and fished in the lake, acting under the advice of a prominent lawyer of the locality, in order to test the right. Upon the trial the state of facts which I have detailed appeared. It appeared that the fishing had been done within the limits of the reservation. Consequently this man, with several others, was fined for the violation of the statute; but upon the facts being represented to the court the judge who tried the case and the district attorney united in a recommendation that the parties be pardoned. As to all the other parties engaged in the fishing the pardon came in time to relieve them from the payment of the penalty; but as to this man the action of the President was delayed so long that the money had been collected and had been covered into the Treasury of the United States. The application for a pardon was made almost immediately after the judgment was rendered, but the action of the Executive upon the application was so long delayed that, in order that this man should not be imprisoned for the fine, his neighbors, as I understand, clubbed together and paid the fine, he being a poor man, and the money, as I said before, went into the Treasury of the United States.

The present Committee on Claims did not adopt the report of the committee of the last Congress, but they report that the pardon of the claimant was a proper exercise of the executive clemency, though it came too late to avail him, and believing that this is a meritorious case for relief, they recommend the reimbursement of the claimant to the amount of the fine so paid by him.

Mr. INGALLS. Were the persons of whom the Senator speaks simultaneously indicted?

Mr. DOLPH. They were.

Mr. INGALLS. And convicted at the same time?

Mr. DOLPH. I think probably there were separate trials.

Mr. INGALLS. But probably at the same term of court?

Mr. DOLPH. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. It would appear a little singular then that while the others engaged in this unlawful enterprise were promptly pardoned the interposition of the Executive in behalf of the beneficiary of this bill was delayed so long that the fine was obliged to be paid. I should conclude, unless further enlightened, that there must have been some circumstance that excluded him at the time from executive consideration; and inasmuch as the mere fact of a mistake of boundary would hardly be apt to be regarded by a jury residing in the neighborhood as constituting a very grave offense, I should feel inclined to think that perhaps the committee were not fully in possession of all the facts.

If the beneficiary of this bill—Mr. Leathers I believe his name is—had been in the same condition as the others who were pardoned and their fine released, that should somewhere appear; but inasmuch as they were simultaneously indicted and convicted at the same term of court, and the others were released and their fines remitted, it would appear that there must have been some reason for the punishment of this defendant, and it looks also as if the committee must have leaned somewhat that way, because they amend the bill to provide that the costs shall be paid and that only the fine shall be remitted. Unless there is more evidence on this point than appears in the report of the committee, my judgment would be that the bill in the light of the evidence ought not to pass.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the duty of the Chair to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Senator from Oregon has already spoken once, but he may proceed by unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOLPH. In answer to what was said by the Senator from Kansas in regard to this matter, I will say that the recommendation of the committee that the bill be amended so as to provide for the payment to Mr. Leathers of the amount of fine, excluding the costs, as stated in the report, is on the recommendation of the United States attorney. I have some letters——

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator be good enough to have them read?

Mr. DOLPH. There are among the papers some letters from the United States attorney of the district which would throw some light on the subject which I pass up to the Secretary to be read for the information of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 339) for the relief of the State National Bank of Louisiana.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement in relation to this bill and by way of reply to the suggestions made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that there is a special order for this hour, but by Rule X the unfinished business takes precedence of the special order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not the unfinished business arising in the course of the Calendar, because that would defeat the whole object of the rule as to special orders. The business that is transacted under Rules VIII and IX is confined to special hours, and if the unfinished business of the morning hour should be taken up as against special orders, the appropriation bills and everything of the kind, we should have a very unseemly struggle. That is not I think the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the President pro tempore has so ruled. There has been a ruling that a matter which by reason of adjournment becomes the unfinished business takes precedence of special orders.

Mr. HARRIS. I was going to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that if he will look at Rule IX he will not feel inclined to adhere to the statement he has just made.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not looked at that.

Mr. HARRIS. Under Rule VIII we consider bills as under the former Anthony rule, but after 2 o'clock we proceed under Rule IX, with all the privileges of debate that pertain to all other questions, and the unfinished business takes precedence of any special order under that rule. I suppose there is no reason why the unfinished business may not be informally laid aside in order that the special order may be considered. I certainly have no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the rule be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the first paragraph of Rule X.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let Rule IX be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE X.

SPECIAL ORDERS.

1. Any subject may, by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present, be made a special order; and when the time so fixed for its consideration arrives, the presiding officer shall lay it before the Senate unless there be unfinished business of the preceding day; and if it is not finally disposed of on that day, it shall take its place on the Calendar of Special Orders in the order of time at which it was made special, unless it shall become by adjournment the unfinished business.

Mr. INGALLS. The unfinished business obviously takes precedence of the special order, but I presume there will be no objection to letting the unfinished business lie over until to-morrow and resuming its place so that the special order may be now considered.

Mr. BAYARD. None at all. I think that is proper.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the unfinished business remain as the unfinished business but informally laid aside in order that the special order may be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposition that the unfinished business shall be informally laid aside and that the Senate take up the special order?

Mr. MORRILL and others. "No objection."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection. The Chair lays before the Senate the special order for 2 o'clock to-day, being the bill (S. 1155) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the the bill (S. 1155) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations.

It provides, upon a deposit of any United States bonds bearing interest, in the manner required by law, any national banking association making the same shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes of different denominations in blank, registered and countersigned as provided by law, not exceeding in amount the par value of the bonds deposited; but at no time shall the total amount of such notes issued to any such association exceed the amount at such time actually paid in of its capital stock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to offer as an amendment, to come in after the word "deposited," on line 9, what I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "deposited," in line 9, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That if any bonds so deposited bear a higher rate of annual interest than 3 per cent. additional circulating notes shall be issued equal in amount to one-half of the interest accruing on such bonds before their maturity in excess of 3 per cent. per annum, such amount to be ascertained and stated by the Comptroller of the Currency on the first day of July of each year hereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, there are other propositions by way of amendment that have been suggested and are in print upon our tables, and perhaps it is as well that the Senate should have all of the various views of the members of the committee and of others than members of the committee before they proceed to elect between the proposition reported by me under the direction of the Committee on Finance or some of the amendments which are in the nature of substitutes.

Mr. President, when Congress assembled in December last and the reports from the various Departments came in to us under communication by the President, we were informed by the report of the Comptroller of the Currency referred to by the Secretary of the Treasury (I read from page 9):

The Secretary of the Treasury has been compelled, on account of the large receipts of revenue in exeess of expenditures, to call in rapidly for payment that portion of the bonded debt which is payable at the pleasure of the United States. During the year ending November 1 more than one hundred and five millions ($105,322,450) of the public debt has been paid, and all of the remaining 3½ per cent. bonds, amounting to $91,596,250, have been called for payment, and ceased to bear interest on November 1. Notwithstanding the fact that two hundred and sixty-two new banks were organized during the past year, with a capital of $28,654,350, depositing $9,375,550 of bonds as a security for circulating notes, the aggregate amount on deposit for that purpose has diminished from $362,490,650 to $352,907,300, a reduction of $9,583,350. More than forty millions of 3½ percents held by the banks on November 1, 1882, have been withdrawn or called for payment; the threes have increased less than twenty-two millions, and the fours and four-and-a-halfs less than nine millions.

He says, continuing:

Unless there shall be legislation by the present Congress which shall reduce the receipts of the Government it is probable that the United States bonds will continue to be paid at the same rate as during the past year, in which event all the threes will be called for redemption within the next three years. This will reduce the bonds held by the banks from three hundred and fifty-three millions to one hundred and fifty-one millions, and cause a contraction in the national-bank circulation of about sixty millions per annum.

My friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] suggests that in this connection it would be well to state the figures found on page 12 of the same report as to the kind and amount of bonds held by the banks on November 1, 1882, and November 1, 1883:

	1882.		1883.
Four-and-a-halfs	$33,754,650	Four-and-a-halfs	$41,319,700
Fours	104,927,500	Fours	106,164,850
Three-and-a-halfs	40,606,950	Three-and-a-halfs	632,000
Threes	179,675,550	Threes	201,327,750
Pacific sixes	3,526,000	Pacific sixes	3,463,000
Total	362,490,650	Total	352,937,300

The interesting point disclosed by this table is that of the 3 percents payable at the option of the Government which will necessarily be retired within the next three years if our present rate of revenue continues is $201,327,750.

With these facts reported to the Secretary of the Treasury he made a recommendation, to be found on the twenty-fifth page of his report, to this effect:

I further recommend that this Department be authorized to allow to the banks circulation to the amount of 90 per cent. upon the average market value for the twelve months prior to the deposit of the United States bonds deposited on security. Thus a bank would be enabled to obtain circulation upon the premium it paid for bonds, as well as upon the par value of them. Had United States bonds never risen above par, no one would have doubted but that a note circulation, based upon them at a ratio of 90 per cent., would have been amply secured. Why should any one doubt that the same ratio on their market value will be safe, the ratio of the circulation furnished to shift in amount to the side of safety as the market value swings to and fro?

And he proceeds to reason upon that subject. A bill containing the suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury to the effect I have just read was introduced and sent to the Committee on Finance. It comes back in the amended shape in the relief proposed to be given in anticipation and by way of compensation for this contraction of the volume of currency which is so shown by these two Treasury officers to be imminent, should be had by enlarging the percentage of currency to be issued upon the deposit of Government bonds which now is allowed at the rate of 90 per cent., and we propose to increase it to 100 per cent., or to use the language of the act "the par value of the bonds deposited," so that for every bond of the United States deposited with the Comptroller by a bank under the system called national banking, the depositor shall be allowed to receive from the Government 100 per cent. in currency notes.

Mr. President, my objection to the proposition of the Secretary of the Treasury was that it would be creating a fluctuating basis for the currency. The market value of the bond depends entirely upon the mutations of public credit, upon the hopes and fears of men, upon the issues of war and peace; not upon the accepted idea of intrinsic value and prompt payment at maturity, but for what may be called the speculative value of the obligations of the United States over and above their par and lawful value. Not only would the adoption of the market value of a security place the currency upon a fluctuating basis, but it is obvious that the deferred payments of the United States are more valuable as investments because they are more permanent and as you approach maturity you have a diminution in the market value of the bonds.

Permanence, stability, certainty, are three of the main essentials of commerce and of finance. A bond that can be paid off at short date or at will certainly will not command the price in the market, as we all know, as that which has a long time to run and which can be calculated upon as a basis of investment, and so of all securities that attend transactions in money.

So then we should find even if we adopted the Secretary's views of basing our volume of currency upon the market value of bonds, that as we approached maturity contraction necessarily would follow, and not only contraction would fellow in the volume of the currency, but even that contraction would not be regulated by the diminishing value of the bond, but it would be subject itself to additional fluctuations in the market value, of which some official must be the judge.

Now there is one form of government which I think we have had a little too much of in this country, and that is bureauocracy. I do not understand that Department-made law is constitutional law in the United States, and yet in fact, perhaps unavoidably, dealing with the vast sums in the periods of excitement through which we have passed, I do not think it is going too far to say that in years gone by to be a Treasury favorite has been a very fortunate thing for a very limited class of people. But for one, in regard to the currency of the country, a matter so profoundly important to every transaction great and small in this land, I do not wish to see it in any degree under the finger and thumb of any official, however respectable or however high in place. We should govern those things so far as we may by public, general laws, declared so that every man can read and understand them, and which shall be incapable of inflection or perversion by any official or any part of the executive government.

So I thought that but one question fairly arose before the Committee on Finance in dealing with this great subject, because the scale of interests affected by the national currency are so great, of such magnitude, that whenever you touch or alter them by law you produce serious results and greatly affect private fortunes.

I do not hold that this body or any of its committees have any right to consider the speculative effects or the effects upon speculation of our legislation. Our duties lie, and our eyes should be turned, only to the great public interests of all classes of the community to be affected by the laws which we enact.

The control of the currency of this country is, in my judgment, committed to the Congress of the United States. They have, as I consider, legislated measurably wisely in that regard of late years, and have given to the people of this country a currency which has been a quiet but a most important and most valuable factor in assisting the development and prosperity we have witnessed in the last ten years.

The currency issued by the Government through the national banks has been met everywhere by the unquestioning confidence of every note-holder in the United States. It has passed current for its full value in every transaction and in every part of the Union. It has carried with it confidence into every transaction, great and small; and who shall attempt to measure the value of that sense of absolute confidence in all the contracts and dealings, numberless as they are, enormous as they are, important as they are, among 50,000,000 of active, trading, commercial people?

It seems to me that when we deal with such a subject as that and propose an alteration in so satisfactory a condition of things, the first question should be, Have you diminished the security? Have you done anything to lessen that confidence? Is the step you propose to take a reasonable and fair one to maintain that confidence? If it is so, then it is justified; and if not, it certainly should not be adopted.

In the present case I do not think a voice could be heard in the country, certainly not from any man of thought and experience, doubting that the increase of this currency from 90 to 100 per cent., secured by the bond upon its par value, is thoroughly ample to maintain just as unquestionably the sense of absolute value of every note-holder of the national banking currency.

Under the present law but 95 per cent. would be delivered to the banks. A redemption fund of 5 per cent. of this 100 would remain as now in the Treasury to await such bank notes as should be presented.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that in the last twenty years a profit of $4,000,000 has accrued to the Treasury from the non-redemption of national notes once issued—a profit of $200,000 a year from the non-presentation and non-redemption of the national currency, which has been a clear gain to the Treasury. I cite that merely to show that the greater the volume of national-bank currency, proportionately greater is the profit to the people of the percentage upon it from the loss and destruction and as a consequence the non-redemption and non-return of the currency.

I say this because I know of no higher duty, and, I may add, no higher pleasure, than for an American legislator justly to increase the confidence of his countrymen in the institutions of their Government. The national banking system under which we now live, the amendment to that system which is now proposed, is (and I would wish so to proclaim it to all with whom my words would have any effect) entirely in the line of absolute security to the holders of these bank notes; it assists, perfects, and continues an absolutely safe currency in the hands of the innocent and oftentimes the ignorant and helpless note-holder—the laboring and trading masses.

Therefore I am content to vote for the simple, plain, easily comprehended proposition of issuing 100 per cent. of notes upon the par value of any bond receivable in deposit as security for the issue of notes from the Treasury.

It may be said that as matters now stand it will assist one class of bonds, probably increase their value, more than another, because we know that the great body of the public debt of the United States, seven hundred and fifty millions, can not be paid except at the option of the creditor and at a high premium until 1907. That stability, security from interference, permanence and regularity which are the great essentials in banking and in all great fiscal operations, will probably compel the banks to purchase those deferred obligations, and hold them as security for the currency that they may desire to use or that their customers may find use for.

I do not think it will be safe for the Senate to be legislating with any view or with any regard to the preference of one bond over another or the incidental effect upon the market value of different classes of United States bonds. I can understand plans that would make these bonds issued to the Pacific Railroads of much greater value than they are to-day, or other plans that might make the 4 percents more valuable, or the four-and-a-halfs. I can only say with such results or as to such results I give the last and the least thought in considering this question.

It is our business as legislators, and it begins there and in my judgment it ends there, to maintain such punctilious and scrupulous regard for the public credit that the fact that a bond of the United States is to be paid according to its face and terms will never be doubted by any man. When we have accomplished that let private enterprise, and speculation, and hopes and fears, and individual plans take up the game of profit and loss and play it at their own risk. We should have nothing to do with such schemes and give them no consideration in our action here. Legislation here should not be enacted with such views. If incidentally bankers or brokers or private investors shall find it wiser and more profitable to buy one class of bonds in preference to another, let them buy or let them sell; all that we can say is that every American bond is good dollar and cent for the promise on its face, and all the interest that may accrue upon it and to the American people who use the currency issued upon the credit of these bonds, we fulfill our duty by passing such laws as shall assure to them absolute security for the notes they hold, be they many or few, large or small. That is stating in a plain way my idea of legislative duty in dealing with the question of currency.

Therefore it is that I have been unwilling to adopt the suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury as it was contained in the bill originally introduced, and why I have given my approval, backed by a majority of the committee, to this proposed measure, that at this time in view of the facts of which every one is cognizant and which have been intelligently stated by the Comptroller of the Currency and the Secretary of the Treasury, why I have felt warranted and why I have felt it my duty to vote for the increase of the volume of the national-bank currency from 90 to 100 per cent. in order to meet, to compensate, to refill the vacuum that will be created by the withdrawal of $60,000,000 annually by the payment of the public debt as is now optional with the Treasury. So far I will go. Further I am not disposed to go; nor am I disposed to take up more complicated suggestions, such as the suggestion proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] wherein the interest payable upon the bond shall be considered as part of the security for the circulation, for I have shown that contraction must logically and necessarily follow the adoption of his proposition. As the bond matures its value as a permanent investment will diminish; as the interest is paid the security for the currency is diminished; and if you add to that the placing upon it a "market" value you have another element of uncertainty and fluctuation which it seems to me is one thing inadmissible in a question of public credit. Security, stability, simplicity, are the three great essentials for the paper money of a people.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I desire perhaps to take more of the time of the Senate than I would do ordinarily, because I expect to-morrow by direction of the Senate to be elsewhere employed, so that if this bill is not disposed of to-day I may not be able hereafter to participate in the debate upon it, and I desire to present what I have to say now. I shall therefore take up the various propositions that are pending as amendments, as well as the bill itself, and state my views of them briefly.

There are two disturbing influences affecting the national currency at this time, one of which is the rapid accumulation of silver coin in the Treasury and the resulting fear that in process of time the currency of the United States will be reduced to the single standard of a silver dollar; the other is the increased difficulty in maintaining the circulation of the national banks caused by the rapid payment of United States bonds and their consequent increased market value. At present I see no hope for any solution of the silver question. The state of public opinion, fully represented in Congress, will not allow the suspension of the coinage of the silver dollar, nor the adoption by the United States of a new ratio for the coinage of silver and gold according to the market value of these two precious metals. All we can do is to drift along until the inevitable exportation of gold and disappearance from circulation and its conversion into an article of merchandise shall reduce all value to the silver standard, when, no doubt, the practical good sense of our people will lead them to coin both metals according to their value now, and not according to their respective value fifty years ago. I would not allude to this silver question except that it is intimately connected with banks and banking. It already casts its shadow upon the future; it is rapidly converting our railroad securities into bonds expressly payable in gold coin; it is creating distrust in investments made upon a gold basis, which sagacious men know will, by the failure of a crop or of a banking house, or some unforeseen event, suddenly bring us to the silver standard. The doubt will then arise, it has already arisen, whether in the adjustment of a new ratio between gold and silver the quantity of silver in the dollar will be increased or the quantity of gold will be reduced. One or the other must be done.

As this question is decided so will the nominal price and value of all lands, commodities, investments, securities, and currency rise or fall. A question so controlling as this does and will affect banks and banking in all their phases and forms, but, as I believe that it is utterly impossible at this session to change the existing law as to the coinage of silver, we must go on coining and piling up in the Treasury vaults silver that we now buy at a discount, which we cannot circulate, and must some time sell at a discount or reduce all other money to the same standard. Until this standard is finally settled coin certificates are dangerous forms of currency. While all certificates are, as now, treated as gold certificates they will be freely taken as equivalent to each other, but with the first appearance of a difference in market value between gold and silver coin the same difference will appear between gold and silver certificates, and the gold certificate will disappear from circulation and be hoarded.

As to our paper currency, I believe I can say, with the concurrence of all parties, that in convenience, security, in ready circulation in this country and in all commercial countries, the paper currency of the United States is the best it ever has had, and perhaps I may add the best ever devised by man. The amount of United States notes limited by law can easily be maintained at par in coin by the maintenance of a reserve in coin of forty per cent. They are a standard for redemption of the circulating notes of national banks. To the extent that interest is saved on the portion of national debt in United States notes it is an advantage to our people, while the coin reserve behind these notes is the steady fulcrum which gives assurance that they will not depreciate or vary with the sudden changes that affect the market value of stocks or bonds. The only doubt that affects these notes is the question whether the legal-tender quality given to them by law is within the constitutional power of Congress. Even if this power is denied by the Supreme Court—and a case is now pending involving that question—the notes would no doubt be generally taken as coin; but such a decision would give to an exacting creditor the means of harassing his debtor, and, what is far more, it would precipitate the demonetization of gold and promote its hoarding and exportation. It is the redemption of United States notes in coin and not their legal-tender quality that makes them current money in every commercial city of the world, and it is the redemption of the national-bank notes in United States notes or coin and their absolute security by the deposit of United States bonds in the Treasury of the United States that give to these bank notes their currency in every part of the United States, even though not a legal tender.

The national-bank note is the best form of paper money, because its payment is absolutely secure. No misfortune can break it. The bank may fail and yet the note is good and passes current, because the bonds of the United States deposited are immediately available to redeem every dollar in circulation. This security of the noteholder is the foundation of the whole system. No other security can possibly take the place of Government bonds. This has been tried in the United States over and over with disastrous results. Coin reserves in the vaults of banks disappear at the first sign of a panic. Even reserves placed under a board of control of a system of State banks have proved insufficient. Compulsory redemption in deposit banks in commercial cities is equally insecure. Mortgages on real estate, State bonds, and commercial paper have over and over again been found an inadequate security. No security for the noteholder in the custody of banks or bankers is safe against failures and panics. No law or threat of punishment can prevent other creditors of a bank from obtaining a preference over the noteholder, who, in all former systems of banking, is the last to be protected and the first to suffer loss. The highest form of security, that of the Government itself, safely deposited in the custody of the Government, is the only one that has proved effective in favor of the noteholder. This fundamental principle of safe banking is now practically recognized by the chief commercial nations, who alone have the established credit to support and maintain paper money at par with coin, and all other paper money is a forced loan by a government, only justified by extreme necessity.

The problem we are dealing with grows out of the fact that our Government bonds bear so high a price or yield so low a rate of interest that banking institutions are in doubt whether it is best for them to purchase the bonds necessary to be deposited as security for their circulating notes or to abandon the issue of such notes. In point of fact it is shown by the Comptroller of the Currency in his last report that the amount of bonds deposited for circulation within one year has diminished $9,583,350, and that this threatens contraction of the national-bank circulation of $60,000,000 per annum (page 10). It appears from the report (page 12) that of the $354,000,000 of bonds deposited by the national banks, $202,000,000 are liable to be paid by the Government on call. The uncertainty and danger of a disturbance and contraction of our currency from this cause is apparent. When any of these bonds are called and paid by the Government they must be replaced by others or the currency based upon them must be paid and canceled. It is true there are other bonds of the United States outstanding to the amount of over a thousand millions, which are redeemable in from seven to twenty-three years, as follows:

Four percents, payable July 1, 1907		$737,946,550
Four and a half percents, payable September 1, 1891		250,000,000
Pacific Railway sixes, payable September 1, 1895	$3,002,000
Pacific Railway sixes, payable September 1, 1896	8,000,000
Pacific Railway sixes, payable September 1, 1897	9,712,000
Pacific Railway sixes, payable September 1, 1898	29,383,000
Pacific Railway sixes, payable September 1. 1899	*14,526,512
		64,623,512

These bonds are to-day in market value as follows:

United States four-and-a-halfs, 1891, registered, 113¼; United States four-and-a-halfs, 1891, coupons, 114⅛; United States fours, 1907, registered, 123⅛; United States fours, 1907, coupons, 123⅜; United States currency sixes, 1895, 129½; United States currency sixes, 1896, 131½; United States currency sixes, 1897, 133½; United States currency sixes, 1898, 135½; United States currency sixes, 1899, 137½.

Under existing law, upon the deposit of any of these bonds with the Treasury by a banking association, it may receive circulating notes to the amount of 90 per cent. of the par value of the bonds, and no more.

Upon this state of facts it is a matter of doubt depending upon close computation whether a bank, which must be governed by the interest of its stockholders, would be justified in investing $125 in bonds yielding an interest of $4 in order to procure $90 in circulating notes burdened with taxes, redemption in coin, and the certain loss in a few years of $25 of the sum paid for the bonds. It can without circulating notes exercise and enjoy all the business of banking except the issue of notes. Still, the advantages of credit which attach to national banks from the close supervision to which they are subjected will always induce prudent men to prefer this system of banking even if the circulation gives them no profit, but it is not good policy to make the restraints upon banking or any other business more than enough to secure the certain and prompt payment in coin of its notes on demand.

The question we have to deal with is whether the present law does not demand of the bank an excess of security in view of the changed value of the bonds and the reduced interest they bear. When the law limited the issue of circulating notes to 90 per cent. of the par value of bonds deposited, they bore interest at the rate of 5 and 6 per cent. and were sometimes below par in market value. It was at that time the interest of the Government to induce the banks to take and hold as large an amount of bonds as possible. All this is greatly changed. The current interest on bonds is now 3 per cent. or less, and they are sold in the market at rates yielding the investor 2.66 per cent. It is now a matter of indifference to the Government who buys or holds its bonds. The only interest it has in the matter is to hold in its vaults ample security for the redemption of the notes issued. To require security of $125 to pay $90 is unnecessary and is a questioning by the Government of its own credit and solvency. Upon this I believe we are all agreed. To continue the old limitation would not only be unjust, but would tend to break down the system of national banks and punish our people by unnecessary contraction of their currency.

There are some, no doubt, who desire to destroy the national banks and have the Government assume directly the issue of United States notes in place of bank notes, but even they must agree that it is now hopeless to press so radical a measure. I do not consider this a pending question. It may arise when the national debt is paid off. Our successors will learn many lessons in statesmanship before that time comes, and they will, with more than one hundred millions of people behind them, be better able than we to say what security shall be provided, what measures shall be adopted, what limits shall be applied to the currency of the future. Sufficient to say we have still thirteen hundred millions of bonded debt to pay, and most, if not all of us, will have disappeared from the stage of life before the currency of the future will have no basis of Government securities to rest upon. It has, therefore, seemed to me that the only difference that should exist as to this measure is what ratio of circulating notes can be safely issued to national banks upon the deposit of United States bonds, so as to furnish absolute security to the noteholder.

Upon this apparently simple question we have before us as many as six different propositions, which I wish briefly to state and discuss.

The first proposition to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate is one that I think was originally submitted at the last session of Congress by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. It provides for an exchange of bonds bearing 3 per cent. interest, running twenty-three years, to be exchanged for the 4 percents, par for par, and proposing to pay in addition in money 15 per cent. of the surrendered 4 per cent. bonds. The objection to this proposition, it seems to me, is that there is no certainty that if such an offer were made it would be accepted. Is it probable that owners of bonds worth in the market 124 would sell them for a 3 per cent. bond running the same time and a further sum of $15 for each $100 bond? I doubt very much whether, in view of the advancing market value of the bonds of the United States, such a proposition would, if it passed, meet the difficulty; and certainly it will not meet it so far as the banks are concerned. It amounts to an offer of $15 for an annuity of $1 for twenty-three years. If successful, the Government would pay one hundred and five millions to reduce the interest on seven hundred millions 1 per cent. per annum without reducing the principal of the debt. I do not consider this as a practical measure to meet the difficulty that encounters us, though as a funding measure it may be worthy of consideration.

The next is a bill which I find lying upon our table, and which has been the subject of discussion in both Houses of Congress. It provides for the issue of a 2 per cent. bond and authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to receive any bonds bearing interest at the rate of 4 or 4½ per cent. per annum and to issue in exchange therefor an equal amount of registered bonds of the United States of various denominations, and offering to pay the difference between the two characters of bonds at certain rates fixed by this bill. I believe this is subject to the same objection, with one additional objection, as the bill already proposed.

In the first place, I believe that any attempt to sell a 2 per cent. bond or a 2½ per cent. bond at par would, even in the present state of the money market, be unavailing, because, with all the advantages that accrue to the existing bonds, still their purchase can be made to yield an interest of 2.66 per cent., and they have never yielded a less rate.

That is not all. It is proposed to make these 2 or 2½ per cent. bonds the basis or security for the notes of national banks. The fatal objection to this proposition is that these bonds would not be sufficient security for a noteholder. In time of calamity, in time of panic, when banks are likely to fail and when the necessity of enforcing the security is likely to occur, they would not sell in the market at par, and therefore the primary object of requiring the security would fail. It would not be sufficient to make good the notes of a failing bank.

The Government of the United States puts itself in the position of negotiating for a low rate of interest for itself at the expense of the noteholder. If these bonds were sold as proposed the Government would get a low rate of interest by inducements held out to the banks to take the 2 percents in order to get circulating notes, yet all that saving of interest would be at the expense of the noteholder, who when the security was called for to make good his note would find it insufficient to pay the whole amount of the notes issued by that bank. This, it seems to me, is absolutely fatal.

I will not vote for any proposition which will not in every conceivable state of the money market be always sufficient in amount to pay the whole sum outstanding for which the bonds are held as security.

The next proposition is that now under consideration, offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], and as this is the central proposition which I am now seeking to contend against, I beg the attention of the Senators to it.

In the first place, I must admit this does give some relief. It enables the banks to issue currency to the amount of 100 per cent. of their bonds deposited. If this bill passes it undoubtedly will enable the banks to issue some $30,000,000 more currency than they are authorized to do under existing law, and to that extent it is a wise and prudent measure; it will tend to relieve somewhat the danger of contraction. There is no occasion for requiring securities greater in amount than the notes to be issued. But the defect of this proposition is that it makes no distinction between the character of the bonds that are deposited as security. The 4 per cent. bonds, of which the amount outstanding is over $700,000,000, are counted as no more value than the 3 per cent. bonds, which are now redeemable. The Pacific railroad bonds, which are worth in the market now 130 to 137, are counted as of no higher value as a security than the bonds which are now redeemable, and are worth only par. So with the 4½ per cent. bonds, quoted at 114. There is not a business man in this country, there is not a banker or a broker or a citizen in the United States who would deal in this way with securities of totally unequal value. This bill is leveled at them all, and says that a bond which may be paid to-morrow shall be held as a security for 100 cents, but the bond that is in the market, and has been in the market a long time continuously, at a large premium, some of which to-day are worth 137, shall be taken as security for no more than a bond bearing 3 per cent. and redeemable at pleasure.

The effect of this bill, if it passes, while it will give temporary increase of currency, will induce the banks to continue to hold the bonds which are now due and redeemable, while, as I understand it, the principal object in view, that is, to secure stability and permanency in our banking institutions, will not be promoted. They will take those bonds that are cheapest in the market, and they will not give stability to the system by purchasing bonds which have twenty-three years to run.

It seems to me that this is an objection to the bill of the Senator from New Jersey. If that objection can be removed, so as to make a discrimination between the amount of circulating notes to be issued upon United States bonds according to their intrinsic value, then the difficulty is entirely removed. But this bill does not meet it.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] stated very properly all the merits of this proposition. It is undoubtedly simple; it gives some relief; but it induces the very thing that we wish to avoid, that is, the depositing bonds now redeemable in the Treasury as security for an obligation that will not mature or may not be presented for years afterward, while it gives no encouragement whatever to the purchase of bonds more valuable, more enduring, which run for twenty-three years, and which would give some kind of stability to the national banking system. That is the only objection I have to the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. It seems to me, if the Senator will pardon me for saying so, that it has precisely the opposite effect. I think it would be very presumptuous in me to put my judgment and my practical knowledge in opposition to the Senator from Ohio; but really it seems to me exactly the other way. If I were a banker, it seems to me that I would ask for permanence, stability in the basis of my business. If a bond can be paid off to-morrow or next week or at any day, it seems to me it would be incredible that a man would deliberately choose such a security as the basis of his business; but the bond that is postponed in payment, that gives me years for the purpose of arranging my affairs in reference to it, is the bond, it appears to me, whose value would be incidentally increased by the proposition now before the Senate. That is the way I look at it.

Mr. SHERMAN. If this bill only gave to that bond of permanent value circulating notes in proportion to its value, its income-producing quality, then that argument would be correct. But here is the question that every banker must solve: Am I willing to invest $125 of money placed in my possession in a $100 bond running for twenty-three years when I can get the same privilege, the same amount of circulating notes, upon a bond worth only par? Am I doing right and acting for the interests of my stockholders to use their money and put it away in 4 per per cent. bonds at 125 when I can get the same amount of circulating notes by buying other bonds at par? That is the question, and there is the rub.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not think that the power or the duty of legislation in this country goes beyond the payment of the public debt, principal and interest, in full. I do not think we have anything to do with the incidental results, what I may call the speculative results that shall follow upon the advantages of the purchase of one class of our public securities or the other. I would wish it known before the world that all classes are equally valuable and that every one is certain to be paid. Then I think that being done the task of legislation is at end.

Mr. SHERMAN. No one doubts that every dollar of the money promised by the Government will be paid and that all its bonds are good, but the trouble and the advantage is that one bond will bear interest for twenty-three years at 4 per cent. and the other bond may be paid any day and only bears interest at 3 per cent.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can not refuse.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I see the Senator from Ohio is disposed to treat the 3 per cent. bonds as practically out of the way for the purpose of banking. That is a question for the surplus revenue to decide. The Senator claims that under this bill which he is now discussing, the bill I had the honor to introduce, we propose to issue circulation up to the face value of the bonds. Say the market value to-day is 122. The Senator from Ohio proposes to issue notes in excess of the face value of the bonds. The original proposition he presented here was to issue $118 in currency upon what the Government only agreed to pay $100. I want to ask that Senator, giving that privilege to the national banks, what then would be the price of the 4 per cent. bonds? Would it be 122 or 140? In other words, is it not another way for bulling Government bonds to a price far in excess of what they are at present, and when any surplus accrues over the payment of the 3 percents it will compel the Government to pay a high premium to get them in?

Mr. SHERMAN. I propose to do what every business man in this country does every day, make a distinction between the intrinsic value of public securities. When I am acting for the noteholders, who are the people of the United States, I say I will demand the best possible security for their notes, so that if a bank fails in no possible condition of circumstances can there be any danger of the payment of its notes. That is the foundation of the banking system. But when I come to say how much of circulating notes I will issue upon any bond, I would inquire, "What is the income-producing quality of that bond?" What would the wisest and most sagacious banker in New York or anywhere in the world do in dealing with these securities? So far as bulling them is concerned I do not care whether they go up or down; I am equally indifferent in regard to it, and so far as the Senator from Delaware is concerned I have no doubt he feels the same way. All I want is absolute security, and to make that security no more than a reasonable and absolute security for the payment of the note.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I ask the Senator to yield to me one moment more.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Who is responsible; who is to redeem the excess of currency over the face value of the bond? The Government has only agreed to pay its face value; the Government is not required to do more. The bank that has deposited the bond and received the circulation is held for nothing above its par value. Now the Senator says he wants to make the notes absolutely secure. Who is responsible for that circulation, to redeem it over and above the par value of the bond?

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is no more than the face value of the bond due, it would be only worth par. This is the case with the 3 percents, but there is attached to each bond bearing a higher rate than 3 per cent. a series of coupon notes, which to-day in the money markets of the world command a high premium. To these 4 per cent. bonds are attached coupons yielding an interest one-fourth greater than the amount of interest which would maintain them at par, and this interest continues for twenty-three years. The various propositions, the one offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and myself and all the others, go upon the fact that the bonds running for a long period of time and bearing a higher rate of interest have also a higher, not market value but a higher intrinsic value which will always make them a better security for a larger sum; therefore we know that they are ample security for a greater sum. As they approach maturity the amount of these bonds must be increased, and when they mature the bonds are only held as a security for an equal amount of notes par for par. In this way at all times the security is always maintained ample and complete for the full amount of the notes issued upon them.

But I do not wish further to press the only objection I have to this bill, and I have desired that the Senator from New Jersey would himself correct it; that he should make a distinction between the character of the bonds so as to give for the bonds of higher value a higher amount of circulating notes. It is no object to the Government to hold more security than is necessary for the safety of the noteholders, but we ought to hold sufficient for that purpose, and in either of the propositions which have been offered by the Senator from Vermont or myself that security is ample.

The next proposition to which I wish to refer is a bill introduced at an early period of the session by me. It was prepared by the Comptroller of the Currency and is in the exact language used by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller in their reports, and was intended to carry out their recommendation. It was not in any sense my measure, although it met my approbation. That bill made the issue of circulating notes depend upon the average current market value of United States bonds for a period of one year before, requiring each and every year the market value according to that rule to be ascertained and proclaimed by the Comptroller of the Currency.

That bill proposed an issue of only 90 per cent. of this market value. That, it is plain, would have been an inducement to national banks to purchase the highest-priced bond, the bond that had the longest time to run. On a bond that is now due under this proposition the amount of issue would have been only 90 per cent. of the principal of the bond, while of the 4 per cent. bonds, which are worth in the market 124, the issue would have been about 112. The result would have been that the market value being fixed year by year the issue of notes would always have been 10 per cent. less than the market value of the bond. When it is known that the market value of a Government bond does not vary like other securities, that made the condition of safety absolute. It is a good thing to say of the Government of the United States that although panics come and troubles come and stocks are obliterated, yet the Government bonds of the United States have never varied even in the darkest hours of 1873 more than 6 or 7 per cent. So this difference of 10 per cent. is an absolute security and makes the proper distinction between the different classes of bonds.

Under that proposition the amount of circulating notes that would be issued upon what are called the Pacific Railroad bonds would have been about 118 or 120 in round numbers; on the 4 percents about 112; on the 4½ percents about 107; and on the bonds that are now due and payable 90 per cent. But it was objected in committee with such force that the majority of the committee yielded to it that the market value was to some degree an unstable value, and therefore it was not a proper basis for banking circulation. I thought it was a sufficient answer to say that the market value of Government bonds is not an unstable value. Commodities and stocks may go up and down, but these bonds have a certain relation to gold, so that they never fall below par. The history of Government bonds since the close of the war has been a steady and gradual rise. Six per cent. bonds at the close of the war were worth considerably less than par in gold. They rose up until they were finally redeemed, and now the 3 percents are at par. The market value of a United States bond is a stable value. It does not decline like the value of other securities. Still there is some fluctuation in Government bonds, and market value depends often upon speculation and not solely upon intrinsic value.

In order to avoid that criticism an absolute rule of value was proposed in the amendment that I now hold in my hand, which was sent to the Committee on Finance. Instead of taking the market value it was proposed that we should take the face value of those bonds and add to that the amount of interest that accrues on each kind of bonds over and above 3 per cent., prior to the maturity of the bond. As the 4 per cent. bond runs for twenty-three years the market value of the bond would be estimated at 123, and it turns out that when you come to test this rule of value by the market value of Government securities it will not vary 2 per cent. from the present value of all these securities. I read a while ago the market value of these bonds. The 4½ per cent. bonds run until 1891, seven years, bearing an extra interest of 10½ per cent.—1½ per cent. above 3, and their market value is 114. The 4 per cent. bonds have an income-producing quality above that of the 3 percents of 1 per cent., or an annuity of one dollar for twenty-three years. That, added to the principal, corresponds to the market value to-day of these bonds. So you may take the currency 6 per cent. bonds, varying in the time of their maturity, every year the 3 per cent. extra interest makes the market value of the bond correspond very nearly to the income-producing value of the bonds.

This bill is, in my opinion, the best basis of a wise adjustment of this matter, and would have made secure the circulating notes and have induced all the banks to secure their notes by the bonds having long periods to run

It is as follows:

That upon a deposit of bonds as required by law any national banking association making the same shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes of different denominations, in blank, registered and countersigned as provided by law, equal in amount to 90 per cent. of the par value of bonds of the United States bearing interest at the rate of not less than 3 per cent., and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, at the date of such deposit; and if the bonds deposited are not so redeemable, and bear a rate of interest higher than 3 per cent. per annum, then the issue of circulating notes may be to an amount equal to 90 per cent. of the par value of such bonds and of the interest that shall accrue on such bonds before they become redeemable, in excess of the interest thereon computed at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum; and at no time shall the total amount of such notes issued to any association exceed the amount at such time actually paid in of its capital stock, nor shall they exceed at any time 95 per cent. of the par value of such bonds and interest computed as above stated. And that all laws and parts of laws of the United States inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

In order to see whether or not this bill would operate well I caused a table to be prepared—and I have it here—showing the exact amount that would be issued upon these bonds from year to year at the rate of 90 per cent., and also at the rate of 95 per cent; it is a simple problem from time to time.

Mr. BUTLER. Will not the Senator have it put in the RECORD?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will insert it at the end of my remarks.

Still this bill did not meet the judgment of a majority of the committee, which was equally divided, and the bill was not reported. Various propositions were tried and were not reported, until finally I deemed it best to vote to report this bill, hoping to correct it in the Senate; because we could all see that it would give some relief, and in the absence of an agreement or some better proposition it ought to pass. I still think, with due deference to the opinion of others, that a proposition like the one I have stated or the one that I will hereafter allude to would be the best.

Now I come to refer to the amendment proposed by my friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. I should certainly yield to his opinion with great pleasure and always treat it with deference; but here is the criticism I make on that proposition: It provides that upon a deposit of 4 per cent. bonds "prior to January 1, 1890, an amount equal to 110 per cent. of the par value of such bonds" shall be issued, and upon all other bonds an issue to the amount of par.

This singles out one class of our bonds, the 4 percents, makes a special rate for them for several years, and then a graduated rate downward, and excludes entirely from the benefits of this gradation the 4½ per cent. bonds and the 6 percents. This, therefore, is an insufficient proposition; it does not meet the difficulty. It makes a discrimination in favor of one class of bonds against another class. It is not a rule that can be applied to all. For instance, the 4½ per cent. bonds run for seven years, bearing an interest of 4½ per cent., and yet they are treated by this proposition as no more valuable than the 3 per cent. bonds, which are now redeemable at the pleasure of the United States. There are $250,000,000 of these bonds which are excluded from the operation and benefit of this gradation. Then, also, there are over $60,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds, the highest in value and in income-producing quality in the market. They are excluded; they are worth in the market some 36 per cent. more than par because they bear a higher rate of interest; and yet those 6 per cent. bonds when deposited can only receive circulating notes to the amount of the face of the bonds. There are now deposited in the Treasury some three or four millions of these bonds, and they would be held at a rate only equivalent to a 3 per cent. bond now redeemable.

Mr. President, while this would give undoubtedly some relief, while the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont would be of some service, it is not a rule applicable to all bonds. It seems to me it is rather a discriminating rule in favor of one class of bonds as against the other classes of bonds, and whatever rule is adopted ought to extend to and apply to all.

There is one other, and only one other, proposition that is before us, and that is the amendment I offered to-day; and I beg the serious attention of Senators to the operation of that amendment. I may not be present here to speak on it hereafter if this debate should be continued beyond to-day.

I saw or thought I could see the difficulties that come from all these different propositions, and I believe the fatal objection made to the proposition of the Senator from New Jersey is that this would continually induce the banks to take the bonds now due, subject to call by the Secretary of the Treasury, and thus continue to disturb our money market, create agitation, compel the bank officers to run around and buy more bonds in order to make good the foundation of their circulating notes. That difficulty would meet us in the very face, and this bill as it is now proposed, if it pass, while it would be some relief in allowing the banks to issue a larger sum than they are now authorized to issue, yet would be the very beginning of insecurity, of uncertainty, of change. They might well refuse to buy bonds bearing a much higher rate in the money market, because they could not get any more circulating notes upon them than upon a bond costing only par. These bonds are only filed as security, and a bank president might have to account to his stockholders if he should sink out of sight 24 per cent. of the capital of his bank without deriving any advantage therefrom. These officers in fiduciary trusts will be governed by the interests of the people they represent; this you must expect of them. If they are good officers they will be governed by the interests of their people, and a bank president might well doubt whether he was justified in sinking $125 of money for a high-priced security unless he got some benefit from it; but if he can get some additional amount of circulation by the purchase of these bonds, and obtain not only more circulating notes, but a greater permanence, then he would be justified in making the investment in the higher-priced bonds. Therefore, to make the security absolute, to increase to some extent the issue of circulating notes, I have proposed an amendment which I believe meets the difficulty; and that is, that there shall be issued, in the language of the bill as it now stands, the face value of all Government bonds because they are all above par, and in addition thereto an amount equal to one-half of the excess of interest accruing on the face of the bond over and above 3 per cent.

That is a very simple proposition, one that can be computed by any one. For instance, to give you the practical application of it on the 4 per cent. bonds which run for twenty-three years from this time, this year the Treasury can issue to the amount of the par value and one-half the excess of interest, which would be $11,150 on $10,000 of bonds. That would be the amount. The interest in excess of 3 per cent. is 1 per cent for twenty-three years or $2,300, one-half of which added to the principal sum makes $11,150.

This is a simple, plain rule. I have a table here which shows the effect of it. On the 4 per cent. bonds the issue at the commencement would be 111½; on the 4½ per cent. bonds it would be 105½; on the 6 per cent. bonds it would be 116½.

There is no man who is so doubting but what knows that this bond has constantly accruing an excess of interest above that which would maintain it at par, and there is no possible doubt but what the security is ample, and then there is the inducement to the banks to buy the longer bonds in order to gain stability, which is so much desired by the Senator from Delaware, while the proposition he supports will invite the banks, almost compel them, to buy the bonds that are now due, liable to be called for any day, and there is no inducement held out to them to buy these bonds which it is the public interest they should invest in.

Sir, in my judgment some such proposition as this is needed; the particular form of it I do not care for. I shall vote for any that meets my convictions. If we can agree on no other I shall vote for the proposition of the Senator from New Jersey, but with grave doubts of its working. It does not furnish the remedy for the disease; it does not induce the banks to hold the longer bonds; it does not make it an inducement to hold the securities that bear a higher rate of interest, and in that respect it is faulty.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I wish to call the attention of the Finance Committee to what seems to be an omission in the bill, and I shall ask to have it supplied. As the bill now reads it seems to me as though it would be impossible for the banks already having deposited bonds to secure their circulation to apply properly to those who issue circulation for the increased amount. I would ask to have the bill amended so as to read:

That upon any deposit already or hereafter made.

And then, in line 8, after the word "in," to insert "the whole;" so as to read:

Not exceeding in the whole amount, &c.

This amendment seems to be necessary to make the phraseology sufficient to justify an issue to banks already having circulation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. MCPHERSON. I ask unanimous consent to have my amendment made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The suggested amendment of the Senator from New Jersey will be read for information.

The SECRETARY. In line 3, after the word "upon," it is proposed to strike out "a" and insert "any;" after "deposit," to insert "already or hereafter made;" and in line 8, after the word "in," to insert "the whole;" so as to read:

That upon any deposit already or hereafter made of any United States bonds bearing interest, in the manner required by law, any national banking association making the same shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes of different denominations, in blank, registered and countersigned as provided by law, not exceeding in the whole amount the par value of the bonds deposited.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, as the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is before the Senate, the few words I have to say on this measure I will say now.

There are five different propositions now before the Senate, as I understand the state of the case, the one I had the honor to introduce, the one proposed by the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], which I do not know whether he intends seriously to press or not; the proposition made by the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] originally, which proposed to issue currency upon what is practically the market value of the bonds; but he now seems to be frightened at the magnitude of the shadow which that singular financial steeple casts and has offered one to-day which goes in the wrong direction to just half the distance traveled by the original one. If he will only take one more such jump he will land in our camp. There is also one proposed by the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. My objections to all of the propositions offered by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Vermont are that they are based upon unsafe ground. They are wrong in principle. They all propose to issue circulation on the speculative value of the bond, and to this I am opposed.

I am too conservative in my financial views to refuse my support to any suitable measure of relief which will afford the people of the country all the currency needed to safely and successfully transact their business enterprises, without which the financial equilibrium will be liable to disturbance and distress to every industry the inevitable consequence. I favor the continuance of the present national banking system until some suitable substitute equal to all the mutations of business, confidence, and credit shall be first found to take its place, because it is the best possible currency attainable at this time—in fact, the most absolutely secure form of paper currency that has ever existed in any time or country; for since the organization of the national banks not a dollar of their circulation has ever been discredited and lost. Behind the circulation and resting upon them stand the Government bonds, and no security can be better than this, for the property of all the people is pledged to the strict payment of the bonds. This currency passes current at its face value in all the States and Territories of the Union and in many of the South American states. Having no legal-tender quality for the payment of debts, yet its debt-paying power is recognized and respected by our people in almost every business transaction.

The history of many of the early banking systems of the country has deepened the prejudice against bank notes, which ask a credit of the holder.

Compare the existing national banking system, if you please, with the condition of things which existed prior to its adoption, and the contrast will furnish an abundant reason for its continuance. It is within the recollection of every Senator here that for every day's travel from the Mississippi River eastward the noteholder of the Western State bank was forced to submit to a loss of from 1 to 3 per cent. on its face value, and when he reached New York, the great financial and commercial center, 10 per cent. was not an unusual discount. Under the old State-bank régime it was often impossible to judge safely of the adequacy of the security behind the bank bill, and under the laws of some of the States no security whatever was required as a safeguard to the noteholder. It is not surprising, therefore, that the value of a bank note was measured largely by the distance it had wandered from the place of promised redemption. In the light which such an experience gives, it is needless to say that the financial affairs of this country can never again be based upon such a system or upon any system which affords less protection than absolute security to the noteholder.

The public mind has been so long accustomed to associate the idea of a safe representative currency with the deposit of a pledge for its redemption that a proposition to base such an issue upon any other form of security is regarded as an innovation fraught with the utmost danger. The national banking act was passed at a time when the Government was in great need of money, and had for its object not so much the supplying of a circulating medium as the creation of a market for the Government bonds among the people. The Government is no longer a borrower, and our action now may be taken without regard to the Government credit. Therefore, owing to the success attendant upon the national bank system, and the satisfactory results, after a long trial, it has achieved, the question of its continuance to a period at least coequal with the existence of the bonds seems to be a well-settled conviction both with Congress and the people. Conceding this, we are called upon to legislate only in respect of the details, to make such legislation as will tend to hold the volume of currency stable and at the same time equal to all emergencies; to prevent undue expansion or contraction of the currency, either of which tends to disturb the financial equilibrium, and both alike in effect, if not in degree, hurtful to our business prosperity.

It may inquiringly be asked, with thirteen hundred millions of bonds of various issues available to protect circulation, an authorized issue of circulation of only five hundred millions, and only three hundred and forty-six millions of the authorized issue of circulation actually in use, why is any relief needed?

The answer is found in the fact that the 3 per cent. bonds are subject to call and cancellation by the Government as fast as the surplus revenue applicable alone to such purpose accrues. Considering that fifty million 3 per cent. bonds have been called and canceled by the Government within a few months, the conclusion is irresistible that contraction is steadily going on, and it becomes imperative to seek some remedy that will arrest its progress.

To effect this end several bills embodying the views of their respective authors and differing widely in the general plan have been presented in the Senate, and each has received due consideration from the Finance Committee. The bill I had the honor to introduce received the assent of the committee, has been favorably reported here, and upon that report we ask the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill reads as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That upon a deposit of any United States bonds bearing interest, in the manner required by law, any national banking association making the same shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes of different denominations, in blank, registered and countersigned as provided by law, not exceeding in amount the par value of the bonds deposited: Provided, That at no time shall the total amount of such notes issued to any such association exceed the amount at such time actually paid in of its capital stock. And that all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

It will readily be seen that this bill provides for the increase of circulation from 90 per cent. of the par value of all the classes of bonds, as under existing law, to the full par value of the bond, and to the par value only. It limits the circulation based upon the bond to exactly what the Government have promised to pay for it, no more, no less. Under this bill the basis upon which the circulation rests is neither fictitious, speculative, nor fluctuating, but one depending solely upon the ability of the Government to pay the bonds.

But it is urged by those who favor issuing circulation upon the market value of the bond that the 3 percents will soon be all paid and canceled, and an adequate inducement should be offered to impel the banks to secure circulation by a deposit of 4 or 4½ percents which have a fixed date of payment, and which by reason of this and of the higher rate of interest they bear command a premium in the market.

Our answer is that the existence of the 3 per cent. bonds, now largely held as a security for bank circulation, depends upon the surplus above current needs in the Treasury, and the amount of surplus will depend upon the action of Congress touching the reserve. The demand of the people, without regard to party lines, has been in favor of reduction of the burdens of taxation, and I have no doubt Congress will heed the demand, and possibly leave us with little or no surplus. Therefore, while the Government retains the option to pay the 3 per cent. bonds at will, the ability to do so rests entirely upon the action of Congress, and in the manner I have indicated.

We answer further, that in the event of the possible payment of the 3 per cent. bonds within the next three years, and which can only be done by continuing taxation at the present excessive rate, the increased circulation of 10 per cent. for which this bill provides will offer all the advantage required, and all that can safely be given, to induce the banks to deposit 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds as a security for circulation in lieu of the called and canceled 3 percents. That banking can be profitably done under this bill at the present market value of the bonds bearing 4 and 4½ per cent. interest, or even at a much higher premium, is capable of mathematical demonstration. To illustrate: The interest-bearing debt of the United States now outstanding, and upon which circulation is now authorized to be issued upon the deposit of the bonds, is as follows.

Four-and-a-half percents, due September 1, 1891	$250, 000, 000
Four percents, due July 1, 1907	737, 641, 050
Three percents, subject to call and payment by the Government	274, 708, 850
Six percents, currency, due from 1895 to 1899	64, 000, 000

Of these bonds the banks now hold as follows:

Four-and-a-half percents	$41, 000, 000
Four percents	106, 000, 000
Three percents	201, 000, 000
Six percents, currency	3, 000, 000

It will be seen from this statement that only two hundred millions of the circulation now outstanding is secured by pledges of the 3 per cent. bonds—the balance, or one hundred and fifty millions, being secured by the higher-rate or premium bonds—and were mainly deposited at a time when the banks enjoyed the option and could instead have deposited the cheaper bond and received in return for it an equal amount of circulation. Therefore with this experience it will not do to say that the premium above the par value exacted in the market for the fixed-date bonds will prevent, to any appreciable extent, their use as a basis for securing circulation. All experience teaches that the market-value of a bond or other security depends only upon what it will yield to the investor, keeping in view always the degree of certainty which attaches to its ultimate payment.

When we reflect that one thousand millions of the 4 and 4½ percents are now in existence and must remain so for many years to come, to which we may add the hundreds of millions of State, railroad, municipal, and other securities now on the market, and to which class of securities additions are being daily made, and many of them as safe an investment as the bonds of the Government and yield more to the investor—considering all this, I may at least be pardoned for not sympathizing with the fear so often expressed that the market price of a 4 per cent. Government bond carrying with it, as under this bill, the right to call for circulation equal to its par value, would prelude their deposit by the banks. For if the tax on circulation be removed—and who can doubt that it will be—the banks will have the advantage of any outside competitor equal to what the circulation they receive will yield. Before closing I will present a table showing as near as possible the value of this advantage.

It will further be seen from the statement I have already given that while the authorized national-bank circulation under existing law is much in excess of that actually taken by the banks, the three hundred and fifty millions now employed is quite enough for present needs, and to which this bill proposes to add 10 per cent., or thirty-five millions more, without requiring the deposit of a single additional bond. We have yet made no mention of the two hundred million coin certificates, and they are constantly increasing in a ratio which seems to forbid contraction of the currency from the cause mentioned to any degree becoming dangerous. I am not called upon in this discussion to express an opinion as to what I may think of the financial policy of a great Government which makes its circulation stand upon a short-legged silver dollar worth eighty-five cents, but I mention it, that my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] may find food for reflection, for his proposed scheme goes to the same extreme in issuing circulation to the extent of $117 on a bond for which the pledge of the Government is only good for $100.

The statement I have made seems to show that there is no present necessity for the issue of any new form of Government bond to meet the requirements of the national currency. Such a necessity can not arise while there are outstanding bonds which can not be called in for redemption in less than from eight to twenty-four years to an amount three times that required for banking purposes. As long as these bonds remain outstanding there can be no contraction by reason of the sale of the bonds by the banks, for the purchasing bank will reissue at once the amount which the selling bank retires. There are $631,000,000 of the 4 percents yet for the banks to purchase, and in doing so the present market price would have to be raised to 138 before the result of the purchase would be as low an income as 2 per cent. per annum, which is the kind of bond proposed at the other end of the Capitol by Mr. POTTER.

There are also $250,000,000 of the 4½ percents, redeemable in eight years, and measuring their market value by the 3 percents maintained at par, or even their present selling prices in the market, with circulation equal to the par value, which are even more desirable for this purpose than the 4 percents. This gap of unavailed-of privileges between the whole bonds and those actually pledged will not fail to keep reasonable the premium upon the bonds.

I offer now a table showing the annual profit on circulation over and above the same investments without circulation, based on 4 per cent. bonds, costing 122, under this bill:

Interest on $1,000,000 bonds at 4 per cent		$40, 000
Interest on $1,000,000 circulation at 6 per cent		60, 000
Gross income		100, 000
Yearly sinking fund, which will retire the premium of 22 per cent. in twenty-four years	$4, 725
Tax on circulation	10, 000
		14, 725
Net income with circulation		85, 275
Compare the cost of bonds loaned at 6 per cent., costing 122:
$1,220,000 loaned at 6 per cent		$73, 200
Profits on circulation		12, 075

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask him whether the figures from which he now reads are the figures issued by a firm of bankers in New York several months ago?

Mr. MCPHERSON. So far as the sinking fund is concerned I think it is the calculation made by Fisk & Hatch, of New York, although it has been subjected by me to an expert, and he agrees in their conclusions. Therefore I accepted it as being correct without question.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask the Senator if he is aware that the banks throughout the country do not accept the computation as being correct either in principle or in its mathematical calculation. I state that to be a fact, and I state also that the Government actuary and other Treasury experts, so far as I know, agree with the banks in their conclusions as to the accuracy of this computation.

Mr. MCPHERSON. In any event there can not be any very material difference. There is no material difference, as I am informed, even among the experts. So, practically, for all the purposes of the argument we will consider it to be correct.

Annual profit on 4½ percents costing 116:
Interest on $1,000,000 bonds at 4½ per cent		$45,000
Interest on $1,000,000 circulation at 6 per cent		60,000
Gross income		105,000
Yearly sinking fund that will retire the premium of 16 per cent. in eight years	$16,108
Tax on circulation	10,000
		26,108
Net income with circulation		78,892
$1,160,000 (the cost of $1,000,000 4½ per cent. bonds costing 116) loaned at 6 per cent. would yield		69,600
Increased profit from circulation		9,292

From the foregoing calculations it will be seen that with the increase of 10 per cent. in circulation, as this bill provides, even with the 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds, the national banks will have considerable advantage over ordinary investors.

If, however, it be found some additional inducement is needed, it would be much safer and better to reduce the tax on circulation than to adopt the plan proposed by the Senator from Ohio:

The only consideration that has been urged with any show of reason against the repeal of this tax is that some provision should exist by which the circulation of the banks shall be charged with the cost of maintaining the National Currency Bureau at Washington. The absurdity of this argument is apparent when it is found that the expenses of the bureau for the last fiscal year were but $220,000, or less than one-fifteenth of 1 per cent. on the average circulation of the national banks outstanding.

In addition to the increased annual reserve which accrues to circulation over and above that obtainable by the ordinary investor who prefers a perfectly safe to a speculative investment, and who will be the only competitor the banks will have in the market for the Government bonds, and whose whole interest lies in the direction of low prices for investment purposes, there remains yet other important pecuniary considerations, to wit: The national banks are made the depositories of Government money for a considerable period of time without the Government exacting interest, and the United States Treasury is made the clearing-house for the redemption of their notes when presented for payment, which is not often, owing to the quality of the security which stands behind them; and it is not unreasonable to suppose that, compared with banking on any other principle or with less apparent security than the Government bonds, the banks thus organized will have a decided advantage in securing the patronage of deposits, which forms a very important item in the banker's profits.

Congress has bestowed on the owners of United States bonds this great exclusive grant over all other people—it has made their notes money. Who but a national banking association can pay his debt to another by giving his own note? If I owe a debt which must be paid in money, my note, however well secured, will not pay it. Again, I pay interest on my note and they draw interest on theirs.

In short, no successful banking, purely as such, can be maintained with profit except under the national system, while the system remains, as it has always been, the pet child of Congress.

The currency of money depends upon the security which it represents. Hence all current money must be secured by something. The money of a national-bank note is secured by United States bonds. United States bonds are secured by the honor and ability to pay the bonds. Honor alone can never be good security for the payment of money. It must be coupled with ability to pay. These together form the security upon which its promises rest and depend for their value; and if not so secured it will not be used as a medium of exchange.

Our 3 per cent. bonds have now reached a higher market value than any like security ever before issued in this or any other country, and consequently are no longer sought by private investors. This applies with equal force proportionately to all other classes of our bonds. Therefore I think it safe to say not much higher rate of premium will be reached unless the bill of the Senator from Ohio becomes a law. It will be remembered also these words are spoken at a time when the interest value of money was never less than now.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] also from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] are armed with substitutes for this bill and have served notice of their intention to offer them in the Senate, both of which provide for the issue to the banks of circulation in excess of the par value of the bonds pledged to secure it. To all such measures of finance I am unalterably opposed as unsound in principle and dangerous in practice. The bill offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] is less vicious than that proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] only because it travels a less distance in a wrong direction, the principle being the same in both bills, and both should be rejected.

The bill of the Senator from Ohio proposes—

1. To issue circulation on the 3 percents to their par value. Of this we do not complain, it being our own proposition.

2. To issue circulation on the 4½ percents to the extent of 95 per cent. of 112, or circulation $106.40.

3. To issue circulation on the 4 percents to the extent of 95 per cent. of 124, or circulation $117.80.

4. To issue circulation on the sixes to the extent of 95 per cent. on 145, or circulation $137.75.

The present market value of the last-named bonds being $1.35, it will be seen the Senator's bill would enable the banks to pay for the bonds with the circulation issued upon them and have quite a margin of profit left. Upon what is this excess of circulation over and above the par value of the bond based. Certainly not upon any promise of the Government, nor yet upon its credit. It is based solely upon the speculative value or market price of the bonds, and which may exist to-day and be gone to-morrow.

Suppose that for some cause the bonds should suddenly drop to par or below it, who is to redeem the excess of circulation above par? The Government is not pledged to do it, neither is the bank to whom it is issued responsible, for, having pledged the bonds as security for its circulation, no more can be exacted. In short, it is an unwarrantable favor extended to the banks, which they neither need, ask for, nor expect, and if withheld will result in no disastrous contraction of the currency. Who, then, wants this extraordinary measure? I have sought in vain, even among bank officers and owners, to find one single person careful of his reputation for financial sagacity who would give it the sanction of his support as being proper legislation by Congress. One old and experienced bank officer declared it to be monstrous, and a most dangerous precedent to place upon the statute-books of the country; and, besides, he saw no immediate necessity for greater relief than would be given by authorizing circulation equal to the par value of the bonds. The bill now under consideration seems to meet every expectation and requirement, and I hope it will be passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. ALDRICH. Unless some other Senator wishes to speak at this time, I should like to have the amendment printed for the use of the Senate, and have the matter go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. BECK. I rose for the purpose of saying that before this debate is closed I shall submit a few remarks. I consulted the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and desiring of course to look at the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, I was about to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, so that the Senator from Rhode Island may have until to-morrow to look over the amendment, which I desire to see myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before the Chair submits the motion he will lay before the Senate several communications from the President of the United States.

TEXAS BOUNDARY LINE.

The following message from the President of the United States was read, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 8th ultimo, from the Secretary of the Interior, and the accompanying papers, relating to the establishment of the boundary line between the United States and the State of Texas.

The matter is presented for the consideration of Congress.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 13, 1884.

EXTRADITION OF TRIMBLE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in reply to a resolution of the Senate of the 11th instant, a letter from the Secretary of State concerning the case of Alexander Trimble, an American citizen, whose extradition has recently been demanded by the Government of Mexico for crimes alleged to have been committed by him in that republic; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

LOSS OF STEAMER PROTEUS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER also laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate of February 6, 1884, directing "that the President be requested, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to the Senate the record of the proceedings, testimony, and findings of the court of inquiry in relation to the events connected with the loss of the steamer Proteus in the Arctic Ocean," I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of the record, &c., called for in said resolution, together with the letter of the Secretary of War, dated the 12th instant, submitting the same to me.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 13, 1884.

STATE NATIONAL BANK OF LOUISIANA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business before the motion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is put.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 339) for the relief of the State National Bank of Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the Senator from Kentucky to allow me to move the reconsideration of a bill which was postponed indefinitely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky withdraw his motion for formal business?

Mr. BECK. Yes; and as soon as such business is transacted I will renew it.

WILLIAM H. MANNING.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Claims on the 6th of February made an adverse report on the bill (S. 1126) for the relief of William H. Manning. I was informed by the claimant that certain papers and proof touching his claim had been lost and had not been considered by the committee on that account. He desires to have a reconsideration. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered and the bill rereferred to the Committee on Claims. I have spoken to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] who made the report, and he has no objection to that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks that the vote by which the bill for the relief of William H. Manning was postponed indefinitely be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered. The motion now is to recommit the bill to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. 791) to amend an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882, after the currency bill under consideration is disposed of, so that it may be the next order of business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California submit a motion to make the bill a special order after the disposal of the currency bill?

Mr. MILLER, of California. Yes; after the currency bill is disposed of.

Mr. HARRISON. There is a bill on the Calendar, which is nearly reached in the regular order, in which our people are a good deal interested, and I do not like these special orders to be set so as to interfere with some progress with the Calendar. I hope the Senator will withhold that for a while and let us make a little progress with the Calendar.

Mr. MILLER, of California. To what bill does the Senator refer?

Mr. HARRISON. A bill regulating patent rights, and so on.

Mr. MILLER, of California. That is on the Calendar?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I do not wish to interfere with the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. Is the patent-right bill, to which the Senator refers, the bill that passed the House of Representatives on that subject?

Mr. HARRISON. The bill which passed the House of Representatives has not yet been reported from the Committee on Patents, but it probably will be to-morrow; and will then be presented as a substitute for the bill already on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California insist on his motion?

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move that the Senate bill No. 791 be made the special order for next Monday at 2 o'clock.

Mr. CONGER. Let the title of the bill be read.

Mr, MILLER, of California. It is the bill (S. 791) to amend an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882. It will not take long.

Mr. PLUMB. I probably shall vote for that bill, and I have no objection to its passage at this moment that I know of; but I have observed that when we make a bill a special order it not only displaces everything else, but we get a leisurely way of doing it, for we are adjourning now earlier than usual, because this is one bill and the people interested in this one bill are in no hurry, and the Calendar and all the people interested in the Calendar are postponed in that way. Unless there is something extraordinary that shall present itself hereafter, I shall vote against making any bill a special order. I am aware that in the ordinary course of legislative proceedings, at the last of the session when we have got to choose among a large class of legislation where we cannot possibly get through all of it, we must pick out something that we hope to get through so as to have some result to our labors, and we do that by making special orders. But to commence at the beginning of the session to make special orders is simply to postpone the Calendar and practically to make all the business of the Senate drop.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion was not agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BECK. I renew my motion for an executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. JACKSON. Before the question is put on that motion I ask that the unfinished business which was temporarily laid aside be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 339) for the relief of the State National Bank of Louisiana, pending which the Senator from Kentucky moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After nineteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 13, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. HAMMOND, after to-day, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. FOLLETT, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. ROGERS, of New York, for one week, on account of important business.

EDMUND WOLF.

On motion of Mr. FINDLAY, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Edmund Wolf, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEONIDAS RUSSELL.

On motion of Mr. HERBERT, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the claim of George Cowles, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LIGHTS FOR HUDSON RIVER.

ADULTERATED AND SPURIOUS TEAS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in reference to a draught of a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the importation of adulterated and spurious teas," a letter from the United States appraiser at New York; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

ATCHISON, TOPEKA AND SANTA FÉ RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in answer to resolution of the House of Representatives of January 31, 1884, requesting information in regard to the certification of lands for the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF DOCUMENTS FROM CAPITOL.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 22d ultimo, requesting the removal of certain public documents from the basement of the Capitol, and reporting compliance with the same; which was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage of the following bills; in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (S. 491) for the relief of John W. Franklin, executor of the last will of John Armfield;

A bill (S. 767) for the relief of Columbus F. Perry and Elizabeth H. Gilmer; and

A bill (S. 1139) authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I rise to a privileged question under the rules in reference to the conduct of the business of the House. On Monday the House passed a joint resolution appropriating $300,000 for the relief of the sufferers from the Ohio River flood. The Senate remained in session and passed the resolution the same evening. I find by the RECORD the resolution came back to the House—of course it could not go to the President until the House was in session again—immediately after the opening of the session of the House yesterday. I find further it was late in the afternoon, and, I think others know, quite late in the afternoon, before this resolution went back to the Senate. I understand the President and Secretary of War were at their offices waiting to receive this joint resolution, sending inquiries by telegraph and telephone respecting it, but it was half past 4 o'clock before the joint resolution reached the President and received his approval, when it was communicated to the Secretary of War immediately, who had arrangements made for prompt action. I therefore offer this resolution.

It is a case of neglect of duty on the part of the officers of the House which should be inquired into.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Enrolled Bills be instructed to inquire into and report the cause of the delay in forwarding to the President for his approval the joint resolution passed on the 11th instant, appropriating $300,000 for the relief of the sufferers from the floods of the Ohio River.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware of the existence of any rule which makes it the duty of any officer of the House to deliver enrolled bills to the President. There was at one time a joint rule adopted by the Senate and House which regulated this matter; but since 1877, the Chair believes, the Senate has declined to regard those joint rules as being in force, and the practice has been for the Committee on Enrolled Bills, or some member of it under the direction of the committee, to deliver these bills to the President for his approval.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But, Mr. Speaker, was it not the duty of the officers of this House to see that that resolution was returned to the Senate without delay? This resolution was forwarded from the Senate to the President, and the object of the inquiry which I have made is to find out the cause of the delay in this House on the part of the officers of the House.

The SPEAKER. If there be any allegation that an officer of the House has failed to perform his duty, the Chair thinks the resolution perhaps might be considered as a privileged matter. But this appears to be a mere resolution directing the Committee on Enrolled Bills to inquire into the cause of the delay alleged to have taken place.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The resolution alleges and is itself prima facie evidence that there was delay, and I hold inexcusable delay. Now, the object of the resolution is simply to institute inquiries to find out whether there was such delay; and, if so, why.

Mr. YOUNG. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio what evidence he has that there was delay in sending this resolution back.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is furnished by the fact which is shown by the record of the proceedings of this House and the Senate that the joint resolution did not go from the House to the Senate until late in the day.

Mr. YOUNG. Does the RECORD furnish that information?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes, sir; and the Chair, I take it, must take notice of the record of the proceedings of this House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the remark of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. My statement was that the Chair must take notice of the records of the House; and the records show that that joint resolution did not go promptly to the Senate.

Mr. YOUNG. What fact is shown in the records that points the gentleman to that conclusion?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have stated the records show it.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I demand the regular order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let me suggest that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The object of the resolution is simply to instruct the proper committee to make the inquiry. I think we are entitled to it, and I ask the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. COSGROVE. I object.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then I ask the Chair to rule on the question, whether it is a question of privilege or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it is a privileged resolution. There is no charge made against any officer of the House.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Except such as appears on the record.

The SPEAKER. There is no charge of dereliction of duty. The Chair has before him the official record of the proceedings of this House as printed by the Public Printer, and that shows that this joint resolution, having been signed by the Speaker of the House, was communicated to the Senate. The Clerk will read from the proceedings of the Senate the record of the receipt of the bill by the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 154) authorizing the Secretary of War to use rations for the relief of destitute persons in the district overflowed by the Ohio River and its tributaries, and making an appropriation for the relief of the sufferers by said overflow; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But that appears late in the proceedings of the Senate, and I am advised by a gentleman whom I do not see now in his seat that it was some time past 3 o'clock before the Senate was in receipt of the joint resolution from the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills, my colleague, is present, and I would like to have him make an explanation, which I am satisfied he can do, which will explain the whole matter.

Mr. NEECE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to explain as to the particular time this joint resolution was prepared and forwarded to the Senate. As to the exact hour when it was received by the committee I can not specify, but it was somewhere about 2 o'clock. It was presented to me to be enrolled, I think, somewhat after 2 o'clock. After it was enrolled I brought it here at once and returned it to the Clerk and it was sent to the Senate. In the course of an hour and a half after it left my hands the resolution was again returned to me.

Mr. COSGROVE. That is to say, then, you received it within an hour and a half after the time it left your hands.

Mr. NEECE. Yes, sir.

Mr. COSGROVE. When?

Mr. NEECE. On yesterday. I say it was returned within an hour and a half after the time it left the House. By half past 4 o'clock the joint resolution was placed before the President for his signature.

There was no delay whatever in the House either in the preparation of the resolution or in the presentation of it to the President for his signature.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What was the delay in the Senate?

Mr. NEECE. I can not tell.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Was there any delay?

Mr. NEECE. I do not know. I know there was no delay as far as the House is concerned.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It was not in the House for two hours, then?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then I desire to know what the Clerk was doing with that resolution during those two hours. I hope this inquiry will bring that out.

Mr. NEECE. The resolution was sent to the Senate and not more than an hour and a half or two hours had elapsed when it was returned to me.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I am informed the resolution in question was enrolled before it was passed by the House, and within three minutes by that clock from the time of its passage the clerk had delivered it to the Senate, who were waiting for it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That was on Monday. My inquiry relates to what was done with the resolution yesterday.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. NEECE] has already informed the gentleman as to that.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The resolution was passed by the House and by the Senate on Monday. On yesterday it was held between the two Houses all day while the President and the Secretary were waiting to act upon it and while the sufferers were under the water. Let us have an inquiry.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If the alleged delay occurred in the Senate, I do not know that we have any right to inquire as to that.

The SPEAKER. The statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. NEECE] shows that as much diligence as usual, if not more, was exercised in this case. There is no charge of improper conduct against any officer of the House so far as the Chair is able to understand the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio. But the Chair will submit the question to the House.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. On the part of somebody there was neglect.

Mr. COSGROVE. If the question is to be submitted to the House, I wish to amend the resolution so as to instruct the committee also to inquire why members stood here and consumed a whole day debating the question when the resolution might have passed in ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, if there be no objection, will submit the question to the House.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I object, and demand the regular order.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I wish to ask the Chair whether the resolution presents a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that it does not present a privileged question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then let the resolution be referred to the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Mr. COSGROVE. With my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to entertain the amendment.

Mr. COSGROVE. I object to the reference of the resolution unless my amendment goes along with it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think an amendment is in order the object of which is to inquire into the mere exercise of the privilege of debate on the part of the House.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I rise to a privileged question, to call up the report of the Committee on Elections in the contested-election case of Chalmers vs. Manning.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman yield to me for one moment to submit a resolution?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I will yield for that if it gives rise to no debate.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. COBB. The Committee on Public Lands have instructed me to report the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to sit during the sessions of the House for the transaction of such business as it may have before it.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG].

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is the call of committees for reports, unless the gentleman from Georgia calls up a matter of higher privilege.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I believe the contested-election case is privileged above the morning hour. I desire to call up that case.

CONTESTED ELECTION—CHALMERS VS. MANNING.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] calls up the report of the Committee on Elections on the contested-election case of J. R. Chalmers vs. Van H. Manning, from the second Congressional district of Mississippi. Does the gentleman desire to have the report read?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I do not desire to have the report read unless it be desired by the House. I suggest that time might be saved by dispensing with the reading of the report.

There was no objection.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Before I proceed to the discussion of the case now before the House, I feel it my duty to advert to a statement made by the honorable gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COOK] the other day, when I had the honor to submit the report in this case. Rising to a point of order (for the gentleman is always astute) after the House on my motion had granted leave to what I termed the minority of the committee to print its views, not in any spirit of criticism or censure, as I well understand, but rather for the purpose of advertising the division in the committee, the gentleman said that on the vote in the committee there was a tie upon the proposition to seat Mr. Manning.

I shall not reveal the deliberations of the committee, nor have I any disposition to evade the responsibility which a tie vote in the committee imposes on the chairman. But I feel that it is due to the committee that the fact should be stated that upon the report in its final form the division of the committee stood as two to one. That committee consists of the same number as that tribunal which once determined the Presidential contest; but instead of being divided in twain, as my good friend and colleague would have the House believe, it was not even divided in the proportion of eight to seven; but upon the adoption of this report there are ten of the fifteen who sustain the report and five who oppose it. And in the report which he soon afterward sent to the Printer he candidly characterizes the report which I had submitted as the report of the majority. It was a very early period in the fight for those who agreed with him to straggle from his ranks.

Mr. COOK. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. COOK. I do not believe the gentleman desires to misrepresent me. We know of the action of a committee only by its vote, and I expressly stated that it was equally divided upon the vote in the committee. Beyond that I know nothing of the views of the members of the committee.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I desire to have no difference on this question with my friend from Iowa [Mr. COOK]. All that I was anxious the House should understand was that on the question as submitted by the House to the Committee on Elections its members stand as two to one. That statement having been made my purpose is accomplished, and I now propose, with the indulgence of the House, very briefly to state the issues in this case.

It will be borne in mind that when the Congress of which we are now members assembled early in December last an impression existed throughout the country and was uppermost in the minds of members of this House that there had been some irregularity in certifying the result of the election in the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi. I advert to this fact not for the purpose of laying any stress upon it with a view to prejudice the mind of any gentleman against either of the parties to this contest, but simply to state the fact that public attention had been arrested on the subject, and it immediately became a matter of inquiry and contention in the House.

When the Clerk of the last House had called the roll of members-elect, that roll showed that from every one of the three hundred and twenty-five Congressional districts into which the States of this Union are divided certificates of election had been sent, except from the district now in question. From his place as Clerk, and in pursuance of the responsibility and authority which usage and the law had conferred upon him, he announced that no person had presented the usual credentials from the second Congressional district of Mississippi, but that Mr. Chalmers had presented a protest, and certain returns and papers, on which he based a claim to the seat.

The Clerk further stated in his announcement to the House that the papers presented by Mr. Chalmers were not in the form required by law, and he had therefore declined to enroll the name of Mr. Chalmers, and the seat was left vacant.

Now I submit that this statement reveals a most extraordinary state of affairs. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COOK] in the report of the minority undertakes to say that such a course was not unusual. Now, if he can cite similar cases since the act of Congress providing that salaries of members should begin on the 4th of March, I would be obliged to him to state them to the House when he comes to argue this case.

When the papers filed by Mr. Chalmers had been described by the clerk in a statement somewhat expanded, it was apparent on the face of these papers, if they were to be credited, that although a certificate had been issued by the governor of the State to Mr. Manning, that certificate was based upon a clerical error.

In that state of the case, I submit that it was not improper that the House should institute an inquiry with a view to ascertain whether the title to a seat in this Hall ought to be allowed to stand even temporarily upon the misprision of a clerk. The issues were not made up on that day, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COOK] states in his report. The broad question which was brought to the attention of the country and of the House was whether the credentials of a member, although in due form, entitled him to a seat on this floor when it was asserted and not denied that those credentials are based upon a plain miscount. That was the question which was presented on the first day of this session, when my friend from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] stated that he held in his hand the credentials in question, and by the resolution which he offered asked the House, on the mere face of such a paper thus overwhelmingly attacked and nowhere defended, to permit or direct Mr. Manning to be sworn in. It was in that state of the case that a brief discussion took place which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COOK] incorporates in his report.

The House adjourned until the next day without determining the question. The intervention of a night gave to every member of this House an opportunity to deliberate and to examine the statements which had been made during that preliminary discussion. The statement of the Clerk of the last House was published in the RECORD and all the papers could be scrutinized. Every gentleman when he returned to his seat here the next day understood distinctly the question which had been raised on the one hand by the statement of the Clerk on the previous day, and on the other hand by the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] my colleague on the committee. When the House met the next morning the gentleman from Ohio stated that at the request of Mr. Manning he asked that the question of Mr. Manning's prima facie right to a seat be referred to the Committee on Elections when appointed.

Now my honorable friend from Iowa [Mr. COOK] criticises the statement in the report that Mr. Manning requested the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] to offer the resolution which finally passed. Perhaps the criticism of my friend is just. But it should be remembered that the announcement of Mr. Manning's request was followed by a running debate in which gentlemen on both sides participated, one gentleman proposing that the case of Mr. Manning alone should go to the committee, other gentlemen proposing that the case of Mr. Chalmers should also be included. It was first proposed to refer only the certificate of the governor; other gentlemen on both sides suggested that all the papers should go. Finally, and as the outgrowth of the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, who had set out with the statement that he was actuated by a request from Mr. Manning, the resolution which sent this case to the Committee on Elections was adopted without a dissenting vote.

I now ask the attention of the House to the terms of the resolution thus carefully and deliberately molded and adopted:

Resolved, That the certificate and all other papers in the contested-election case of J. R. Chalmers vs. Van H. Manning, from the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi, be referred to the Committee on Elections when appointed, with instructions to report immediately whether, upon the prima facie case as presented by said papers, said Manning or Chalmers is entitled to be sworn in as a member pending the contest on the merits, and not to affect the final right to said seat.

Mr. Speaker, the House distinctly refused to refer to that committee only the question of Mr. Manning's right to the seat. The House refused to exclude from the consideration of the Committee on Elections the evidence offered here by Mr. Chalmers to impeach the certificate. The House not only refused to take that course, but instructed the committee to determine the prima facie right to the seat from all the papers.

Now the gentleman from Iowa argues that the phrase "prima facie case" is a technical one, which means absolutely and always one particular thing. I deny it. The gentleman can not find two disputed cases in which the phrase means exactly the same thing. Let me briefly advert to the history of the prima facie case in Congress.

In the early days of Congress members-elect assembled at the Capitol with their credentials in their pockets. The Clerk of the previous House—pursuing, perhaps, the idea that by being useful he might forward his re-election—prepared from these credentials the roll of the new House. This soon grew into the settled practice, and out of it arose the statute which now regulates the presentation of credentials to the Clerk of the previous House.

And as late as the Twenty-third Congress I find it was the usage, when any gentleman's name was called and before he was sworn, to have his credentials read at the Clerk's desk. So that before the House organized members-elect were accustomed to have their credentials read before they were allowed to qualify as members. Whenever a member's commission was assailed, the question came up before organization and was determined by an inspection of the commission alone. The necessity of organization fixed this limit to the inquiry; all other matters affecting the ultimate title were in these early days required to be stated in memorials and went in the first instance to a committee.

The phrase "prima facie case" was employed to define the effect of the usual commission prior to organization, and to distinguish that case from a trial on the merits. But when a case is taken out of the House and sent to a committee for determination without an investigation of the entire case on all the merits, I affirm that it is the usual and ordinary practice to define the limits of the inquiry by the committee in the resolution of reference. The phrase in question, then, means the whole scope of the inquiry, and is ascertained by the terms of the resolution.

I propose in the progress of this discussion to state, if gentlemen will indulge me, a few cases which support my view, and establish a standard at variance with that which the gentleman from Iowa lays down. I have already undertaken to show how the phrase arose. I have already stated why the House in this very case in sending it to the Committee on Elections enlarged the meaning of the phrase and gave us broader limits and prescribed to us the rules for our decision in this case. I ask the Clerk to read from "Contested Elections from 1869 to 1870," a report signed by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] in the case of Hunt vs. Sheldon.

The Clerk read as follows:

WHO, THEN, HAS THE BEST PRIMA FACIE TITLE?

It is claimed by the majority that, upon the certificates, and the laws upon which they are based, Mr. Sheldon has the highest and clearest prima facie right to the seat. A brief examination will show the fallacy of this conclusion or assumption.

A prima facie right must be founded upon and established by prima facie evidence, and prima facie evidence is that evidence which is sufficient to establish the fact, unless rebutted. Now apply this definition to the case under consideration. Unless rebutted, the certificate which Mr. Sheldon holds is prima facie evidence, first, that an election was held at the time, place, and for the purpose therein expressed; and, second, that he received the highest number of votes cast at the election, which necessarily constitutes his election, and thereby establishes prima facie his right, or, in other phrase, his prima facie right to be admitted to the seat. But his certificate or prima facie evidence is rebutted by a like official and authenticated statement of equal force, and showing, also, first, that the election was held at the time, place, and for the purpose therein expressed; and, second, that Mr. Hunt received the highest number of votes cast at the election, and which necessarily constitutes his election, and thereby establishes prima facie his right to be admitted to the seat. Now, what becomes of Mr. Sheldon's prima facie right? It falls, of course, unsustained by prima facie evidence; and thus his claim is of no higher validity than Mr. Hunt's in a prima facie sense, and upon the form of the papers, and in substantial merits, as made manifest on the face of the certificates, it becomes utterly worthless and proves nothing to the advantage of Mr. Sheldon.

Mr. COOK. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I will.

Mr. COOK. Is not that extract taken from the minority report? And, further, let me inquire whether the House did not, in passing on the case, repudiate that doctrine and establish the contrary doctrine, which was that the certificate was the sole prima facie evidence?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I will endeavor, Mr. Speaker, to answer the inquiry of my honorable colleague, because it is entirely pertinent.

The House did not in that case establish the doctrine that the certificate was the sole prima facie case. On the contrary, the report of the majority, submitted by Mr. Stevenson, after reciting the certificate, stated that "if the case rested upon the certificate alone the right of the holder to a seat might be questioned."

I will now add that the statement just read by the Clerk was taken from the report of the minority of the committee, which was signed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and Mr. Burr. But it must not be forgotten that the dispute between the gentleman and myself is as to what is a prima facie case.

I call attention now to a case which was decided by the House on a report submitted on the 9th of February, 1874, the case of Thomas M. Gunter vs. W. W. Wilshire, from the State of Arkansas. The resolution in the case which I am about to read is similar to the resolution under which the House sent this case to the Committee on Elections:

Resolved, That the credentials and papers in the possession of the Clerk of the House in the cases of contested election from the first and third districts of Arkansas be referred to the Committee on Elections with instructions to report at the earliest date practicable who of the contesting parties are entitled to be sworn in as the sitting members of the House.

The resolution, therefore, is very near in form to the resolution which sent this case to the Committee on Elections, with only this difference: that in the case now under consideration the instruction of the House was that we should determine the case from the papers referred to us.

The Committee on Elections at that day consisted largely of Republicans, but there were some gentlemen on the committee of conspicuous fame throughout this country. The minority report was made and signed by a gentleman whose name ought to commend his views not only to the House, not only to Mississippi, but to the entire Union. I quote from the minority report by Mr. L. Q. C. LAMAR:

Now, if the construction which a majority of the committee have put upon this resolution of the House is the true one, and it necessarily confines the investigation of the committee to the instrument by which the prima facie right is established, it follows that they should not have extended their inquiries beyond the face of this certificate, nor thrown before this House any information derived from evidence and proofs of a secondary character. Upon their construction of the resolution the proper course, in the opinion of the undersigned, would have been to have reported a resolution to the House that no prima facie right to a seat on this floor existed in this case.

But having specified in this way the construction which the majority of the committee in his opinion had put upon the resolution, but which construction, I must add, is not very apparent in the report of the majority, Mr. LAMAR proceeds:

The secretary signs both of these papers, which so completely falsify each other, each of which explicitly state him to be its author.

It seems to the undersigned that the documents, so absolutely false and so fatal to each other, constitute the only foundation on which rests the prima facie title of Mr. Wilshire imperiously demand that the case should be recommitted for examination upon its merits.

In the case I have cited Mr. LAMAR, now an honored Senator from the State of Mississippi, presented the views which I have read.

Now allow me to present briefly some of the evidence referred to the committee. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania has notified us that he proposes to recommit this case to the Committee on Elections, in order to confine our inquiry to the narrow line which the report of the minority of the committee contemplates. The gentleman from Iowa, although he construes the resolution differently, says in his report that it would be better to rescind these instructions than that the House should be guided by them. I can not agree, Mr. Speaker, in that view, but the gentleman from Pensylvania proposed to recommit this matter and confine it to that exclusive and narrow inquiry.

There is no propriety, sir, in recommitting the case to the Committee on Elections in order to defer that purpose. Both reports assert that the certificate of Mr. Manning is unexceptional in form upon its face. There is no dispute about it, and there is no reason in the world why the case should be recommitted. Indeed there would have been no reason to send this case to the committee in the first instance if it was to be determined upon an inquiry so narrow. No man could have denied that the credentials here are entirely correct in form, and therefore it is unnecessary now, as it was in the outset, to send the case to the committee on that issue alone. But if the House desires to retreat from the position which it took upon this subject, let the House rescind the resolution and adopt that of the gentleman from Iowa, and swear the gentleman in on this narrow title. There is no propriety in recommitting the case to the Committee on Elections.

We in this House are the judges of the qualifications, elections, and returns of the members, and the House in my judgment is absolutely omnipotent in determining these matters. Neither the gentleman from Iowa nor Mr. McCrary nor Mr. Cushing nor any other authority under the sun can lay down any limitations on the authority of this House to determine the returns of the members who claim seats upon this floor. But as I understand that great deposit of authority, which is exclusive and from which there is no appeal, no tribunal on earth has authority to reverse its decisions. In the exercise of this authority the House can send to any committee it pleases any aspect of the case, any section of the case, and may divide it into a dozen chapters, and try each one seriatim if it so desires. Who denies it? Who says that is not our prerogative? No act of Congress can repeal it, although the President and Senate concur in that repealing act. The House in the exercise of this authority may instruct the Committee on Elections to pursue the inquiry which they laid down in the resolution, and we have endeavored to discharge that duty.

In looking to evidence in this case how does the case stand? The secretary of state of Mississippi is the person authorized to cast up the canvass and certify the result of the election to the governor. A certain period of time is specified within which this is to be done. Among the papers which came to the secretary was a return from the commissioners of election from the county of Tate, a part of the second Congressional district. That return on one side of it had the certificate which is embodied in the report of the committee and to which gentlemen can refer. It stated how many votes Mr. Manning received, how many votes J. R. Chalmers received, and how many votes certain other persons received. Now, on the reverse side of that paper was what is called a "tally-sheet," and which was referred to in the certificate on the opposite side. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COOK] in his report, with a little spice of acrimony mingled in it, states that we printed that paper wrong; we ought to have presented, he says, the tabular statement first and then printed the certificate on the back

It seems that my very astute friend considers this paper a sort of double-ender.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not care which side of it you take first. As a matter of fact I understand that that side of it which gives the certificate, and which is signed by the commissioners, is the usual form in which the returns from a county of Mississippi are sent up to the secretary of state, and I further understand that the returns from nearly all the other counties in that district were sent to the secretary of state in the form of that side of the paper which I have had printed in front. It is true that that certificate refers to a "tally-sheet" on the opposite side. Whether that is in front or in the rear I do not care. But it will be noted that that part of the paper which certifies the result of the election, and is dated and signed by the commissioners, gives the vote for Mr. Chalmers, while on the back of it in this unsigned tabular statement the name of Chalmers does not occur, but J. R. Chambless is stated as having received 1,472 votes.

Now, by which side of this paper should the secretary of state have been governed? He should have been governed by that side which passed under the eyes of the commissioners and which they signed with their names. Would a fair man have taken leave of that statement in the certificate and hunted on the other side of the paper for mere figures and tabulated lists without heading and without signatures, to determine what was the vote of the district? I say every fair rule of construction would have required the secretary of state to have been guided by the face of the paper on which the signatures of the commissioners were placed. But take the other view of it. Suppose the other, the back of the paper, was a part of it; and then go further and suppose that the two were irreconcilable. Then you have a paper which states an impossibility, which states an absurdity, which states a thing on one side which is contradicted on the other side; and the fair way at last would be in this view of the case to have rejected the return altogether. If that return had been rejected altogether there would be still a majority against Mr. Manning.

In any view, therefore, Mr. Speaker, according to these returns Mr. Manning was not elected, and the certificate which he received from the governor of Mississippi was based upon a state of facts which, after a most careful scrutiny, shows he was a minority candidate.

Now, let us go a step further to show that the construction which I have put upon this paper is a fair one. After the election contest had begun in this case, after Mr. Chalmers had served Mr. Manning with notice of contest, in which he challenged Mr. Manning's presumptive title to a seat, and in which he alleged this error of the secretary of state and set out the mistake made by the commissioners of election for the county of Tate; after that issue was stated in the notice of contest, the gentleman whose friends claim the seat for him in this case replied to the notice, and in that reply, which was before the committee, he admits broadly and unequivocally that 1,472 votes were cast in Tate County for Mr. Chalmers. And he went further, and said in that admission that the inspectors and clerks of the several election precincts did certify to the county commissioners of election that Mr. Chalmers received a majority of the votes. And not only that, sir, but he went further, and added in a spirit of manly indignation that he would not take advantage of this miscount, would not take the seat until the House should vindicate his right to it. That was the admission in the answer. Are we not to take that as evidence here?

Hence, Mr. Speaker, I assume that the construction which I give to these papers is right. If the gentleman who claims this seat, Mr. Manning, was right when he after having looked into it and as the party most interested to know the truth of it—when he himself in the formal pleadings which make up the issues in this entire litigation says to his adversary, "I do admit that the papers show that you got a majority of the votes; that an error was made to your prejudice of which I would scorn to take the advantage, and I will not take the seat until my right to it is vindicated by the House"—I ask if my construction of the return is not vindicated by this manly statement from Mr. Manning, and does it not conclude all inquiry on this prima facie case?

And the gentleman from Iowa in his report says that a man who claims to represent the 150,000 people of this district can not give away the rights of those people, and his admissions must pass for naught. That is another of those nice and high-toned distinctions which Judge Black would have denounced, but which I shall not take the liberty of denouncing, as the "snapperadoes" of a nisi prius trial. [Laughter.]

A member-elect has certain rights, and he can make admissions which will bind his constituents. I affirm that proposition, and the gentleman from Iowa who controverts it must deny it, and thus the issue will be made up between him and me. In the first place, the act of Congress prescribes the pleadings in an election contest, and among other things prescribes that in the notice and answer the controverted points shall be stated, and that the things which are admitted may be taken as proved.

I put it to any gentleman on this floor, if he were a litigant in such an unfortunate controversy as this, and if there were a fact patent and plain and palpable, would he not save his adversary the expense and trouble and delay of proving it if he himself could not deny it and he knew it was capable of easy proof on the other side?

Now to go a step further—for I am addressing lawyers, and I assume that they are familiar with the conduct of cases in courts—can not a member-elect represent his constituents or refuse to do so, as he pleases? Can he not decline to take his certificate, and in that way create a vacancy in his district? Can he not resign his seat? Can he not give away the rights of his constituents in every vote which takes place in this Hall? And for the purposes of this trial in an election contest is he not the accredited agent of those who voted for him in the election; is he not the party immediately interested; and when he is litigating with his adversary for a high place in this Hall, which I think the most honorable in the world, can he not against his own interest make a statement which may be at least taken for the truth?

You have the case of a certificate resting on the plain, palpable, and unmistakable misprision of a clerk. I say it is just as fatal to the right of representation in this Hall as if it were a corrupt or a forged certificate or as if the governor of Mississippi had accredited as a representative here of that honorable constituency a man who had never been a candidate for the office.

Once lay down the precedent that after you have the evidence in a case, after you have learned the truth of the case, sitting here with even larger powers than the secretary of state of Mississippi had, ay, with larger powers than everybody in Mississippi had—if in the exercise of that high omnipotence, after you have had all the truth of the case, you shall decide that a man may stand on a certificate which rests on such a basis as this, I would not give a fig for the title of any member on this floor.

In the consideration which I have tried to give to this case I have endeavored as best I could, not in any very consecutive or formal manner, to state the substantial rights and rules involved. I may desire again to be heard somewhat upon it. But just now allow me to say that there is no question in my judgment which can come before this House which ought to arrest more of the serious attention of Representatives than the question which is now under consideration.

It is a matter of the gravest public concern. It is not a question which concerns alone the supremacy of a particular political party in the State of Mississippi. It is not a question so narrow even as the limits of a great State. It is a question which involves in its scope the character and the judicial precedents of a great party.

I have endeavored in this case to divest my mind of every consideration of partiality on the one hand or prejudice on the other, for I admit that I felt both. I had the difficult duty of keeping along that narrow line which, as I think, forms the boundary between right and wrong. Casting aside temptation on the one hand and on the other, I have endeavored in such consideration as I have been able to give this case to hold aloft the banner of the majority in popular elections.

In the consideration of an election contest, in which we approach the only majesty in this country and bow before the footstool of the highest sovereignty, we ought to uncover our heads and leave behind us the fouling dust of the campaign. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ELLIOTT. As a member of the Committee on Elections I desire to state the reasons why I can not concur in the report of the majority of that committee. The conclusion seems to have been reached by a majority of the committee that neither Manning nor Chalmers have prima facie right to a seat in this House.

The House by resolution directed the committee to report whether upon the prima facie case as presented by the certificate of the governor and the papers on file in the contested-election case of Chalmers vs. Manning the said Manning or Chalmers is entitled to be sworn in as a member pending the contest on the merits.

The question submitted, as I understand it, was whether Manning or Chalmers had the prima facie right to a seat on this floor as a member from the second district of Mississippi, and that question was to be determined on evidence competent to establish a prima facie case. The committee was directed to determine the question from the certificate of the governor and all the papers on file in the contested-election case.

Under the resolution it became the duty of the committee to examine all the papers on file, but I submit that it was not the intention of the House by the resolution to declare a new rule of evidence contrary to that established by an almost unbroken line of precedents of this House in contested-election cases, and contrary to a rule which has been steadily adhered to by the courts of last resort in nearly every State in the Union for the past half century. The House did not intend that the committee, after an examination of the papers filed, should give weight to or act upon such as was manifestly incompetent evidence upon the issue directed to be determined.

If they were competent they were to be considered, and if they were not they were to be rejected. A judge must inspect a paper before he can determine whether it should be admitted as evidence or rejected as incompetent. Submitting a case to a court upon the papers filed in it does not authorize him to consider and act upon improper testimony because it has been filed by the party seeking the benefit of it.

Manning presented the certificate of the governor of Mississippi in due form. It was not shown or claimed that he obtained it by fraud or that it was unintentionally issued by the governor. The governor certifies under the seal of the State that Manning was duly elected to represent the second district of Mississippi in the Forty-eighth Congress.

Under the law of Mississippi it is made the duty of the governor to certify the result of the election of members of Congress; no other officer of that State is authorized to make any statement or issue any certificate in reference thereto.

No other person is authorized to give evidence to this House upon the subject. He has done so, and confessedly in due form, and as his certificate is the only proper evidence, it must be conclusive.

Mr. Manning came before the committee, then, with as perfect a prima facie title as any member on this floor could show if called upon so to do.

What answer is made to this perfect prima facie case? Chalmers has very little upon which to rely in his effort to attack the prima facie case of Manning and to establish a prima facie case for himself. What was found on the files which the majority of the committee say the House compelled the committee to act upon by the resolution of reference?

First. The certificate of the election commissioners of Tate County.

Second. A canvass of votes by counties by the secretary of state.

Third. A second or supplemental return by the commissioners of Tate County.

Fourth. A copy of the record in a proceeding in one of the circuit courts of Mississippi against H. C. Myers, secretary of state, which on appeal was reversed and dismissed by the appellate court.

This is all, except the answer of Manning, of which I will speak in a moment.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Upon what ground did the supreme court reverse the action of the circuit court?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Want of jurisdiction.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Not at all. Let the gentleman read the opinion of the court.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Then the gentleman can argue that matter after a while.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. The supreme court based its action on the ground that it had no right to coerce the governor of Mississippi to issue a double certificate.

Mr. ELLIOTT. If the gentleman is accurate in reference to that he is accurate beyond the record, for the record introduced before the committee shows no such thing. It is out of the way at least; the whole case was dismissed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what one of the papers I have named is competent evidence to be even considered in ascertaining which of these two persons has a prima facie right to a seat on this floor? Are the commissioners of Tate County able to give testimony to this House upon this subject? Is the canvass of votes by the secretary of state competent evidence?

The supplemental return of the commissioners of Tate County the majority of the committee reject as incompetent. Why is not that return just as competent as any of the other papers to which I have called attention?

According to the argument of the chairman of the committee [Mr. TURNER] none of the papers on file in the contested-election case would have been competent evidence upon the question to be determined had they not been made so by the resolution of reference. And it follows that if all were made competent by the resolution of the House, then the supplemental return of the commissioners of Tate County and the ex parte affidavit of the clerk of said commissioners were also competent.

Do these fugitive papers overturn the only competent evidence of a prima facie title to an office?

It is said, however, that if these papers are of no value, Manning by his answer contradicts the certificate of the governor and disproves what might otherwise be a perfect prima facie case.

No one will contradict the correctness of the proposition that the answer is to be construed as a whole and not by a single sentence.

Manning admits that a mistake was made in the count of the vote of Tate County, but from first to last he maintains that he was duly elected, and that he can show, when the contest on the merits is entered upon, not only that he was apparently elected, as shown by the governor's certificate, but that he is entitled to hold the seat to the end of the term. He says to Chalmers, "When the contest on the merits is entered upon I will show that your candidacy had its birth in a conspiracy and ended in bribery and corruption at the polls."

In my judgment, the answer should not be considered on the question of which of the parties has a prima facie title, but if it is considered, taken as a whole, it makes for instead of against Manning. I go further, however, and take the position that the answer is not to be considered at all upon this question, for the reason that this is not a controversy over a private right. The people of Mississippi are interested, and they can not be deprived of their chosen Representative by any admission that Representative may have made. A person who had received a majority of ten thousand votes might admit himself out of a seat and put his opponent in his place by admitting in his answer to a notice of contest that his opponent and not himself received a majority of the votes cast at the election.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. If the gentleman will permit me, I would like to ask him a question at that point, although I do not wish to interrupt him, having no desire to break the line of his argument.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. If I am not mistaken there is a case in the text-books which originated in the State of Pennsylvania, an election in which it appeared from the returns that there was a tie vote. Both of the gentlemen admitted it was a tie, and on their admission the governor of Pennsylvania ordered a new election. At the new election Mr. John Sargeant, a name rather well known in Pennsylvania, was returned as elected. After he had been returned at the new election certain citizens of the district sent a memorial here, which was the usage then, challenging his right to a seat and claiming an election had been made before, that the other was not a tie. The Committee on Elections reported, and the House sustained the report, that the admissions the other party as well as Mr. Sargeant had made were a complete waiver of their rights and neither the House nor the committee could go behind that.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I have not examined the case, and I did not know of the existence of it.

Mr. COOK. I have it before me. It will be found as the note on page 162 of McCrary, the standard authority on election cases:

> But it is very doubtful whether relinquishment of claims to the seat here referred to should have been regarded as either legal or binding.
> The constituency were chiefly interested, and they were not consulted.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I desire to call the attention to an authority on this subject, McCrary on Elections, sections 359 and 360:

> In the case just cited it was further held that the rule that a failure to answer is a confession of the allegations contained in the complaint will not be applied to a contested election in the House of Representatives. The reason is that the inquiry is of a public nature and not a case involving private rights alone.

Upon this point the committee, among other things, say:

> The contestant and the sitting member are by no means the only parties interested in this representation. The electors of the district, each and every one of them, have a vital interest in that question, and no one of them can be precluded by any laches not his own from insisting that the choice of the majority shall be regarded. No confession of the sitting member, however it might bind him personally, can place the contestant in the seat unless he is the choice of the majority, nor deprive that majority of its rightful representation.

I submit that upon reason and authority it is clear that Manning had not the power to admit away the trust confided to him by the people of the second district of Mississippi.

We have this queer state of things according to the majority report: The evidence which was sufficient to overturn Manning's prima facie case made by the governor's certificate did not make a prima facie case for Chalmers.

The majority are here forced back to the position taken by the minority, to wit, that nothing but the certificate of the governor is evidence upon the question of a prima facie case.

It is said that the House is asked to do what Manning himself would not do. Not at all. The House is asked to determine the legal question or recommit the question to the committee, and if it shall be determined that Manning has the prima facie title, he can ask to be sworn in as a member pending the contest on the merits.

I trust I may be pardoned for saying that it has not been shown so far why this case should be made an exception to all which have gone before it. I can not understand why Manning should not receive the consideration heretofore accorded to persons holding the certificate of the officer by the law of the State where the election occurred authorized to ascertain and certify the result. Is there any good reason why he should be made the first victim of a new rule of evidence, which can breed nothing but uncertainty and confusion?

No matter how great may be the regard of the members of this House for the statesmanlike qualities and political integrity of Chalmers, Mr. Manning should not be prejudiced thereby. He has the right to ask that a well-settled rule be applied to his case and that the House declare that he has the prima facie right to a seat on this floor and is entitled to be sworn in as a member pending the contest on the merits.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Is it not a fact that all of the evidence in this case as we read it here has been before the committee in print?

Mr. ELLIOTT. It has not been before the committee. The evidence has been printed.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. How long has it been printed?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I do not know; perhaps two or three weeks.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Has it not been printed for at least five weeks?

Mr. ELLIOTT. The whole has not been, so far as I know.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Has it not been printed and lying upon the shelves of the document-room for at least five or six weeks?

Mr. ELLIOTT. What does the gentleman intend by his inquiry?

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Simply this: I have read this evidence, and it is of that character that any man—any legal man—can determine its merits within three hours and write a correct opinion upon it. And there is not a particle of evidence by which Mr. Manning can claim a right to his seat here upon the merits as here presented.

Mr. ELLIOTT. If that be so, does it affect the prima facie right? I know of another case which has been before the committee to which it would not now be proper to call attention, but where I apprehend not a member of the committee has a shadow of doubt as upon this case upon its merits, and they rest upon the ground that the man who has the certificate of the governor is entitled to hold that position until he is turned out upon a contest on the merits.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN].

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. Does the gentleman have any right to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. COOK. I wish to inquire of the Chair if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLIOTT] has exhausted his hour.

Mr. COBB. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania has not occupied his whole time, and he yields a portion of his time to his colleague [Mr. CURTIN]. That he has the right to do.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if he requires so much.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLIOTT] has thirty-five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CURTIN. I only desire five or ten minutes.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to my colleague the time he desires.

Mr. CURTIN. I offer a resolution, which I desire to be considered now, in reference to this case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can offer the resolution at this time, and it can be considered as pending, but it can not be voted on until the debate is closed.

Mr. CURTIN. I ask the Clerk to read the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. For what purpose is the resolution offered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] to state he desires to offer a resolution. The Chair in response to that has said the resolution can be offered and read, but can not be voted on until the debate has been concluded. The Chair is informed there is no resolution at the Clerk's desk except the resolutions reported by the majority and minority of the committee.

Mr. CURTIN. It was read from the Clerk's desk a few days since.

The SPEAKER. The paper then read has gone to the Public Printer.

Mr. CURTIN. I offered the resolution on the day the report was made. It was read from the Clerk's desk and was objected to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution as it is printed in the RECORD of that day's proceedings.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the question of a prima facie right to a seat on this floor involved in the contested-election case of James R. Chalmers vs. Van H. Manning, from the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi, be recommitted to the Committee on Elections, with instructions to ascertain and report immediately to this House whether a certificate of election to the office of Representative from said district to the Forty-eighth Congress was issued by the proper authority, as required by the laws of the State of Mississippi and of the United States, to any one; and, if so, to whom.

Mr. CURTIN. I offered that resolution with the expectation that this House would refer the question as to the prima facie right to the seat on this floor without reference to the merits or the evidence which may be taken on the one side or the other. On the first day of the session an effort was made to seat Mr. Manning on prima facie evidence that he had a right to a seat here; on precisely the evidence on which every other gentleman on this floor occupies a seat.

The case was referred to the Committee on Elections, as it should not have been, by a modified resolution; and the Committee on Elections have made a mistake or this House made a mistake in adopting that course; for that committee seemed to have found it necessary to go behind the return of the governor of the State and to make an investigation of the facts on which they reported.

The second district of Mississippi is entitled to representation on this floor. It is one of the grand fundamental principles of this Government that all the people shall be represented in these Halls. The certificate of a governor of a State should seat a man on the prima facie case. It is an act of sovereignty. It has been recognized from the beginning of this Government down to this day; and there is no precedent upon record in the Congress of the United States to change the regular current of right and justice and to defeat the demand of the people for representation.

It is of little consequence what General Manning said. He showed his sensitive honor when he presented his certificate and said he would let the House declare whether he had a right to the seat or not on the prima facie case at their pleasure, but that he reserved to himself the right in any contest made for the seat to show that he was entitled to it in fact as well as in law.

If the certificate of a governor of a State, under the great seal of the State, the emblem of the sovereignty of a State, will not give a citizen a seat upon this floor, I pray what will make prima facie evidence of the right to a seat here? You all occupy your seats upon such certificates. To say that this House would have the right, and, having the right, would exercise it, to judge of the validity of a certificate of the governor of a sovereign State and deprive any portion of the people in this great country of the representation here to which they have an inalienable right, is in violation of the principles which lie at the very foundation of this great Government. Then one by one each member as he comes to this House with the same evidence could be rejected and turned away from this Hall. If General Manning is not entitled to his seat then the evidence to determine that is before the committee. If he is entitled to remain in his seat the evidence will satisfy this House of that right. But in the mean time the people of the second district of Mississippi have a right to a representative on this floor.

The committee unanimously say General Chalmers has no such right on the prima facie case; and as to the right of General Manning the committee are divided, and it is now for this House to say whether the certificate of the governor of Mississippi that the people of the second Congressional district have elected General Manning as a Representative to this House shall enable him to take his seat or whether on the report of the committee charged with the duty of ascertaining who has the prima facie case he shall be turned back in the face of the people of the second district of Mississippi and of the certificate of the governor of a sovereign State.

We only ask that General Manning shall be seated on the credentials he presents from the governor of his State. After that the committee which is charged with this high and important duty can examine the question whether on the facts and in a fair contest he has a right to continue in the seat, and this House has the power to turn him out and seat Mr. Chalmers in his place if it pleases.

Mr. BELFORD. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CURTIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BELFORD. Now, suppose that the governor of a State issues a certificate to a party, and that party comes to this House and publicly declares that that certificate is fraudulent and that declaration is known to every member of this House, would that not be an exceptional prima facie case?

Mr. CURTIN. I would be very glad to answer the question.

Mr. BELFORD. And I would be glad to hear your answer, too.

Mr. CURTIN. The gentleman may put a case of that kind, and it may be possible that the governor of a State may choose to go back upon his certificate. That does not affect the right of General Manning to his seat under his certificate.

Mr. BELFORD. He has admitted that such was the case.

Mr. CURTIN. He has admitted no such thing. He has done no more than an honorable man would do, refer the certificate of the governor of his State to this House; that is all he has done. He never has admitted that he was elected by fraud, forgery, or falsehood. That part of the gentleman's question he drew from his imagination, which we have learned in this House is fertile, progressive, and spreading at all times. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELFORD. Just a moment.

Mr. CURTIN. If my friend and ancient neighbor, born near where I was born and whom I have known all his life, will permit me I will say that I understand well his wit, his sharp parliamentary knowledge and experience, and more than all his diffusive eloquence. And I can not be annoyed by him, for I am too young a man for an old fellow like him to tease. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELFORD. That will do. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. CURTIN. General Manning has never admitted what my friend from Colorado says. Since my friend from Colorado ascended the Rocky Mountains to the high altitude of his State, where he breathes an air so light and pure, he seems to have forgotten the solid sense of the Juniata Valley, where he was born and raised. If he will go back there I will give him lessons in law at least, if I can not in parliamentary right and usage. [Renewed laughter.]

I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES].

Mr. OATES. How much time does that give me?

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. BLACKBURN]. The gentleman has twenty-five minutes.

Mr. OATES. The report of the majority of the Committee of Elections would seem to declare that the action of the House was either a refusal to seat Mr. Manning on the usual evidence of the governor's certificate or it was a renunciation by him of his right to admission to such seat on the governor's certificate alone. The erroneousness of that conclusion, I think, can be very easily shown, and from that erroneousness results all the other reasons and conclusions which culminated in the report of the majority of the committee.

By reference to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing the debates of the first day of the session, when the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. CONVERSE) offered a resolution that Mr. Manning be sworn in as the member-elect from the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi, will be found this:

Mr. KASSON. Now I desire to ask the further question, has the House the right to order a man who does not claim his right to a seat on this floor to be sworn in?

Mr. CONVERSE. He does claim his right to a seat upon the floor, and has never admitted to anybody, either publicly or privately, but that he was honestly elected.

A little further on is this:

Mr. KASSON. But the gentleman from Ohio appears here and is claiming his seat. It is publicly alleged that the gentleman from Mississippi referred to in the resolution does not claim his right to a seat.

Mr. CONVERSE. That is entirely a mistake. The gentleman has never admitted, as I have stated, that there was any doubt of his right.

On the next day this took place:

Mr. CONVERSE. I am requested by Mr. Manning to ask unanimous consent of the House that the question of his prima facie right to a seat on this floor be referred to the standing Committee on Elections when appointed, with instructions to report thereon at the earliest day possible.

He asked only for the reference of the prima facie case to the Committee on Elections. Then followed a discussion of the question, showing that in every instance those who represented Mr. Manning on this floor insisted upon his right to the seat, and conclusively showing that the intention in referring the case to the Committee on Elections was to refer simply the prima facie case. I read from the debate which then took place:

Mr. KEIFER. The objection we make is that it is proposed to refer the prima facie right of one gentleman only, not both. By the papers here—by the certificates from the secretary of state of Mississippi—the result of the vote is shown absolutely. Let both cases go to the committee. They can be trusted to report upon the question whether Mr. Chalmers or Mr. Manning is entitled to the seat——

Mr. BLACKBURN. Prima facie.

Mr. KEIFER. Prima facie.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is all fair.

Mr. KEIFER. That is all we ask. If the gentleman will include the two we make no further objection.

That shows conclusively that merely the prima facie case was referred to the Committee on Elections. The majority of the committee in my judgment have placed an erroneous construction upon the action of the House, and seem to regard it as their duty to consider all the papers which were referred to them, and to put the case outside of the rules heretofore applicable to prima facie cases.

Inasmuch as it is conclusively shown that the reference was of the prima facie case only, we are brought at once to the inquiry, What is a prima facie case? It is that which entitles a member to be sworn in and to take his seat here until the case can be heard upon its merits. McCrary on Elections says:

It is enough for the prima facie case if the certificate comes from the proper officer of the State, and clearly shows that the person claiming under it has been adjudged to be duly elected by the officer or board on whom the law of the State has imposed the duty of ascertaining and declaring the result.

The person duly commissioned has the right to exercise the functions of the office until upon investigation of the merits it is judicially determined otherwise. The certificate of the governor is the evidence and the only competent evidence in the case to which this House can look. If the certificate is in the usual form there can be no misapprehension, and unless the certificate itself refers to something outside, in deciding the prima facie case the House has no right to go beyond it. If it refers to any extraneous matter, then it is competent for the House to pursue it and determine upon whatever it refers to, whether the person holding the certificate has a prima facie right to the seat or not. And the case referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania as being the only exception I do not deem an exception, but confirmatory of the right of General Manning to the seat. Let me invite the attention of the House for a moment to that case. I read from McCrary:

The case of Hunt vs. Chilcott (2 Bartlett, 164) is one of the very few cases in which a certificate of election signed by the proper authority has been held insufficient to entitle the holder to be sworn in as a member of the House of Representatives and to occupy a seat pending a contest.

But in that case Mr. Hunt did not rest his case upon the paper only. He introduced the evidence of Governor Cummings in its support; and inasmuch as Governor Cummings testified in a manner that contradicted the certificate the committee had the right to accept that evidence. The governor was a witness produced by Mr. Hunt, and to whom he gave full credit. Therefore the contradiction was invoked by himself, and the committee was authorized to act upon it. It was tantamount to the reference to extraneous matter by the certificate itself, because the evidence was produced by the person claiming under that certificate. But in this case General Manning produced no such evidence.

It is said by some that he made an admission in his answer to the notice of contest that 1,472 votes which were returned for Chambless were in fact cast for General Chalmers, which would determine the election on the face of the returns in favor of that gentleman. But I submit to this House there is nothing upon the face of the certificate nor is there any admission upon the part of General Manning that brings this case within the principle of the case of Hunt vs. Chilcott. The admission, if there be such, in General Manning's answer to the notice of contest is a part of the case upon its merits. As was stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the proper construction to be placed upon that answer is by taking the whole, not a mere part of it. The committee in considering the prima facie case, which is all that this House intended to refer to them, had no right to take anything as evidence beyond the face of the paper. They could no more look at the answer to that notice than they could go into the testimony in the case for the purpose of arriving at a solution of the question which was referred to them.

What is a prima facie case? That which at first view entitles a party as a matter of right to the thing he claims. Why, sir, when an action is brought in any court upon a promissory note or a bond, and the note or bond is read in evidence to the jury, that, without more, entitles the plaintiff to recover. In this case, where a man presents to the House a certificate of the governor and upon it claims a right to be sworn in, with no extraneous evidence referred to by it, nothing in connection with it to impeach that certificate, how can this House deny him the right to be sworn in? It is not only the right of the people of the second district of Mississippi, but it is also a right personal to him. When a gentleman comes here bearing the certificate of the governor of his State, regular in form, and demands of this House that he be sworn in, it is his right to be thus sworn in.

But, says some one on the other side, "General Manning admitted that he had no case." Suppose he had proclaimed from the housetops that General Chalmers and not himself was elected, I ask the House when was the time exhausted for his retraction; when was there an end of the locus pœnitentiæ? Even though he had thus declared time and again, when this Congress assembled and was organized he presents this paper; and where is the law that makes any prior declaration on his part operate as an estoppel? There is no such authority to be found in the books.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will my friend from Alabama allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. OATES. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Manning certainly thought there were some bad features in his certificate; he declined to present it to the House; he was anxious that the House should assume the responsibility of accepting the certificate and seating him. The House refused to take that responsibility, and referred the question to the Committee on Elections. That committee now declines such responsibility; and the question, like Banquo's ghost, comes back to us again. I know it was understood that the whole question—prima facie and merits—was referred to that committee. I wish the House to determine the question on that basis.

Mr. OATES. I did not yield to the gentleman for a speech; but I will answer the points he has made, and I am glad he has made them.

Mr. COX, of New York. That is the only point I have to make, and this statement saves me the necessity of making a speech.

Mr. OATES. In the first place, this House did not determine that General Manning was not entitled to the seat. There is no evidence whatever that it ever questioned his certificate or thought it at all invalid. The gentleman can find nothing whatever upon which to question that certificate, unless he goes behind it into the merits of the controversy. The only basis for questioning this certificate comes from the admission of General Manning in his answer; but to use that for this purpose is going behind the certificate and is not admissible in a case like this.

The House did not decline to seat General Manning. There was a debate and contest about it, as the RECORD shows; but the House came to no conclusion. On the second day there seemed to be a division of opinion in the House; and, as the RECORD shows, Mr. Manning then requested that the prima facie case be referred to the Committee on Elections when appointed. Gentlemen here who believed that both sides of the question ought to go to the committee caused the resolution to be amended so as to refer the question of the prima facie right not only of Mr. Manning but of Mr. Chalmers also. That was the question referred to the committee; and there was no action of this House that operated as an estoppel upon any one; there never was any action to conclude any one or to bind this House. There was simply a reference to the committee, which performs in this case an office similar to that of a register of a chancery court. It was the reference to them to ascertain that fact and report it for the final action of this body. They have ascertained and reported it to the House.

Is there anything in the action of the House or the committee to conclude anybody? The question now is whether this House will confirm the report made by the majority or the minority of the Committee on Elections, to which the matter was referred. Why should there be any difference made in this case? Why should it be treated differently from any other? The universal custom and precedent here has been that where the case comes regular in form and from the officer authorized by law to issue it the party shall be sworn in on it. And when thus sworn in, whatever there may be in the papers or in the answer by way of confession or in the testimony on file, goes to the merits of the case, and has nothing to do with the House in its action on the prima facie case. That is the difficulty the committee has got into, that it has gone into evidence which should not have been considered touching the issue referred to it. Had the majority confined itself to the issue presented to it, which was the prima facie case and nothing more, there would have been no difficulty. But they have gone beyond it. They are disposed to go beyond the case, as some members were when it was proposed to swear in General Manning on his certificate. This disposition to go beyond the testimony which makes the prima facie case is what has made all the difficulty. Exclude all that from the case which belongs to the merits, and you have no difficulty whatever. It is only matter that pertains to the merits which has produced this confusion.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing more in the case than the naked one referred to the committee. The majority of the committee refers to one paper as not legal evidence, and therefore it did not give it much weight. If it were not legal evidence no weight whatever should have been attached to it. No importance should be given to it. Looking to the issue on the evidence found in the papers, only that pertinent to that issue ought to have been tried by the committee. Had that been done we would not have had this confusion. Then the case was a clear one for General Manning.

How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes.

Mr. OATES. I yield it to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, there should be no difficulty on this question in view of the strong and well-settled precedents of the House. And those precedents are in the line which always carries this House through correctly.

I have discussed this question, I believe, twice before while I have been a member of this House, and before I did so discuss it I had studied the question I thought pretty carefully. And I undertake to say now to this House that there is not a precedent from the foundation of this Government down to the present time where a member presents his certificate in due form of law, signed and sealed by the proper authority of law fixed by that law, that that member has not been held to be entitled to his seat. You can not find any well-digested authority to the contrary even when fraud enters into it. Here is what McCrary says in his book on elections:

> There can be no doubt but that a certificate of election regular in form, and signed by the proper authority, constitutes prima facie evidence of title to the office, which can only be set aside by such proceedings for contesting the election as the law provides. The certificate, whether rightfully or wrongfully given, confers upon the person holding it the prima facie right to the office.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. COBB. I have but five minutes, otherwise I should be glad to answer any questions.

Mr. BLAND. This is a question, or a suggestion rather, that I would like to hear answered by somebody, as I regard it as the important point in connection with this case.

Mr. COBB. What is the question?

Mr. BLAND. I was going to suggest that where a party presents the certificate himself he may be sworn in. But here is a case where the party has never himself presented the certificate. Now he wants to be sworn in. Let him present his certificate at the desk and ask to be sworn in, and I will vote for it myself. Otherwise I will never do so.

Mr. COBB. I am very glad the gentleman has called my attention to this matter, but I will say that that does not alter the case presented here.

I understand that the resolution which was referred to the Committee on Elections required them to investigate and report upon the prima facie case. That they have done. All they had the right to consider was whether or not the certificate was regular upon its face and whether it purported to be signed by the proper authority constituted by the State for that purpose. When the committee made that investigation and determined that the certificate was properly signed, that it was regular upon its face, that committee under instructions of this House had no legal right to go further in reference to the matter. Any other doctrine would lead this House upon the unbounded ocean of uncertainty. It is a doctrine which the House laid down at the very beginning of Congress; it is the doctrine of every parliamentary body of this kind where its members are elected, and a doctrine which must prevail, or otherwise we are constantly interrupted with questions which will interfere with our legislation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COBB. I would like to have a few minutes longer.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Indiana be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. COBB. The record of this case, Mr. Speaker, shows that the certificate was presented to the House by a member of the House directed to do so, as I understand, by Mr. Manning himself. The question was then squarely brought before the House as to whether Mr. Manning under that certificate was entitled to a seat, and I insist, as I have said, that he was. I insist that unless this committee could find that the certificate was void, that it was irregular, that it was not in conformity with the law—it does not matter how much fraud entered into it—the House must act upon the prima facie case, and the committee could only act as the House could act. It has only the authority which the House had. It is the agent of the House. The case was one which the House should have acted upon when it was presented, and without reference to a committee to determine the prima facie right to a seat on the floor; but after having done so, after the House had declined to act upon it and had referred it to the committee, then the committee acquired the same power to determine it that the House had in the first instance, and no more.

It was referred on the application, it is true, of Mr. Manning himself, which was a mistake, and he ought not to have made such an application. He should have presented his certifiate to the House and let us become responsible for the determination of the question as to his prima facie right. In that case there would have been no trouble.

Our friends on the other side are as much interested in this question as we are. It is not and should not be a political question. It does not matter whether Mr. Manning is a Republican or Democrat, but the question is whether we shall lay down or rather carry out a rule which must necessarily prevent this body, when it comes to organize, from independent action upon the subject or otherwise get us into trouble in the future. Whatever may be my belief in Mr. Manning's right ultimately to the seat when we come to the consideration of the question upon its merits, I would vote to seat him now upon the certificate, because I would vote to seat any man who comes here and presents us with a certificate which is proper upon its face, which is legally binding upon its face, a certificate which is signed by the proper authority constituted by the Legislature of the State to sign it. It is the certificate that we all come here upon, and this House never could organize, it never could become an organized body, without permitting members who are elected to present their certificaces such as this and ask their seats. After that then comes, of course, the question as to the merits. The committee takes the question and solves it, and whether or not Mr. Manning is entitled to a seat will be determined then. But it can not be done now; and the committee, if it went outside of the certificate, and I say it with all due respect to the members of the committee, for they are honorable men and I have no doubt acted conscientiously—but when they went beyond the certificate they disregarded the resolution of the House, and went behind it and took and considered evidence that they should not have considered. If we had referred the case to them upon the merits, then they could well have gone behind the certificate; but we did not refer the question of the merits. We referred only the prima facie case. That case they have determined by going behind the certificate and determining questions of facts that they have no right to deal with under the resolution.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States, was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

The message announced the approval of the joint resolution (H. Res. 154) authorizing the Secretary of War to use rations for the relief of destitute persons in the districts overflowed by the Ohio River and its tributaries and making appropriations to relieve the sufferers from said overflow.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—CHALMERS VS. MANNING.

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would not have opened my mouth in this case had I not been a member of the Committee on Elections; and even under these circumstances I would have said nothing had it not been for the fact that so much interest has been manifested in this particular case.

As I voted with the majority of the committee on this case, and contrary to the opinion of many of my associates on this side of the House, I thought it necessary to explain or give the reasons why I voted as I did. I may say that in the Forty-seventh Congress I was a member of the Committee on Elections, and I started into the examination of cases in that Congress without any partisan feeling; but I was in a few weeks so completely swamped that I did not know where to land. But in this matter the Democratic party, having a majority in this House, and I believing myself to be as honest as a man ought to be, or ordinarily is, rather, I thought I would look at this matter free from all bias. Therefore I have no sympathy with appeals that may be made to members on this side of the House because one man thinks one way and another man thinks another.

It must be admitted that some rule must be adopted as to which of the claimants shall qualify and take the seat during the investigation of a contested-election case on its merits. The general rule is that the man holding the certificate or the ordinary credentials shall qualify and take the seat. There should be no difference of opinion among us about that proposition where the certificate remains unimpeached. Why? Because it is absolutely necessary to prevent anarchy and to insure the organization of this House.

We have on this subject a well-settled doctrine staring us in the face. No man will pretend to dispute the fact that when the certificate was issued by the governor of the State of Mississippi and delivered to Mr. Manning he thereby acquired the prima facie evidence of title to a seat in this House. That certificate conferred upon him a right which is an individual right, a right that neither the governor of the State of Mississippi nor the State of Mississippi itself could take from him. Who could deprive him of it? Manning, and nobody but Manning, or this House. He could say, "I waive it." He could say, "I will not avail myself of the right given me by this certificate." He could say, "It never ought to have been issued to me." And no power on earth could have prevented him from occupying that position.

The question in this case is, what did Mr. Manning say? He says, "I admit that the inspectors and clerks of the several election precincts did certify to the county commissioners of election in their respective counties that you, Chalmers, received the majority of the votes cast. I further admit that the 1,472 votes which were cast for J. R. Chambless were in fact cast for you, J. R. Chalmers, and that the name of Chambless appeared in the return by their clerical error instead of your name." I have given the exact language of this man who holds the certificate and claims a seat in this House. What does he say? He says, in a word, "I admit that the returns show that I was not elected; I admit virtually that the secretary of state made a return to the governor of the State of Mississippi that was not true. I admit that the governor of the State of Mississippi issued a certificate to me on a return that was not true; in a word, I admit that you, Chalmers, to-day should hold the certificate and not I. I admit that you to-day have the prima facie title, and not I."

Mr. COSGROVE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. Yes, sir.

Mr. COSGROVE. Does Mr. Manning not say in connection with that, notwithstanding that admission, he is entitled to the seat and entitled to the certificate?

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. The gentleman will please let me pursue my own line of argument, and I will answer that before I conclude.

After Mr. Manning has made these admissions, what further does he say? I will give his exact language. In connection with these admissions he says: "I also state that I will not take my seat in said contest or ask the Clerk of the House of Representatives to enroll my name as a member thereof until I have vindicated or until the House shall have affirmed my right thereto." In other words, he says: "Under these circumstances I will not take my seat."

What are the circumstances? The circumstances are, as he says himself, that the returns do not show that he was elected. He virtually says: "I will not avail myself of this certificate, which was issued to me through a clerical error; but I will vindicate myself by showing that the returns were false, and that one-third of the votes which you (Chalmers) received were obtained by fraud and by other unfair means." "On account of this clerical error," he says, "I will not take my seat. What was this clerical error? Fourteen hundred and seventy-two votes were not counted for Chalmers which should have been counted for him. Suppose they had been counted for him, what would have been the result? Mr. Chalmers would have had the certificate, and not I. Therefore, on account of this clerical error, which deprived Chalmers of the certificate, I will not take my seat, or even ask the Clerk of the House of Representatives to enroll my name as a member thereof, until I have vindicated myself by showing that I was in fact elected."

Now, is there any other rational or sensible conclusion to be drawn from these facts and these circumstances than the conclusion that this is the position which Mr. Manning assumed in this case? And this is the position which the record holds him to to-day. But it is said that this is a public matter as well as a private one; that the people of the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi have such an interest in this matter that we can not permit a man to say he was not elected. Now, I say that while the party holding the certificate can not seat another man by his admissions, he certainly can by his confessions so impeach the integrity of his own title that this House will not seat him on the prima facie case. Suppose that Mr. Manning was the duly-elected Representative from the second Congressional district of Mississippi, has he not the right to refuse the seat? Has he not the right to say, "I will not avail myself of the certificate which was issued to me by mistake." Why, he certainly has that right, and no power on earth could prevent him from exercising it. He is entitled to say, "I will not avail myself of the right given me by the certificate, but I will vindicate myself by showing that the returns were false;" and that is just exactly what the good people of Mississippi and the good people of this country expected. So far as I am individually concerned I am opposed to forcing a man into a seat in this House on a certificate which he himself says was issued to him by a clerical error.

I come now to the point which has been mainly discussed by the gentlemen who have preceded me. It is said that we can not go behind the certificate. I need not refer to the scope of the resolution which referred this case to the Committee on Elections, because it will be remembered that that resolution directed us to examine all the papers in the contested-election case of Chalmers against Manning and determine from them who had the prima facie right to the seat.

The position that I assume in this case is that we did not need these broad instructions which the House gave to the Committee of Elections. I hold that the refusal by this House to seat Mr. Manning and the reference of the prima facie case alone to the Committee of Elections authorized us to examine all the papers relating to the prima facie case. Let me repeat, outside of any instructions by this House the reference of the prima facie case alone to the committee authorized that committee to examine all the papers relating to the prima facie case.

It will be remembered in this connection that Mr. Chalmers filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives a protest against Mr. Manning being allowed to take his seat on his certificate. What did he say? He charged that that certificate was fraudulent; that it was not issued by the proper officer of the State of Mississippi. That certainly related to the prima facie case. That certainly called in question the validity of the certificate itself, and the Committee on Elections had the right to examine that matter.

It will also be remembered that Mr. Chalmers gave Mr. Manning notice of contest, and in that notice stated that he would contest not only his ultimate but his prima facie right to a seat in this House. Why? Because he charged that the certificate was not issued by the proper officer, and that it was fraudulent, thus calling attention to the validity of the certificate. That certainly related to the prima facie case.

In answering that notice of contest Mr. Manning admitted that the returns showed that Mr. Chalmers, and not himself, was elected. He denies that the certificate was issued by fraud, but admits that it was issued to him in consequence of a clerical error. That certainly related to the prima facie case, and the committee had the right to examine that issue. In other words, I can not conceive of any committee on earth examining into a prima facie case without understanding what the issue is.

But it is said that the law provides that we shall not go behind the certificate. I know that we must have laws and rules to guide us in our search for truth; but there is no law on earth that could prevent a man from pleading guilty, and there is no law on earth that will keep this House from knowing what it does know. And it certainly is acquainted with the facts in this case.

The difficulty with those who believe that the certificate alone should be investigated, and that it is sufficient to seat Mr. Manning, is that they confound prima facie with conclusive evidence. We all know that a certificate is simply prima facie evidence of title. Yet the minority of the committee claim that in this case we shall consider prima facie as the conclusive evidence.

What is prima facie evidence? It is evidence which uncontradicted and unexplained is sufficient to determine the question at issue. The minority of the committee would have us say that we can not contradict the prima facie evidence of this certificate by a comparison of it with all the papers relating to the prima facie case.

It is true that this House has adopted, for the purposes of organization, the fiction that a certificate clean on its face shall be considered as conclusive evidence of the right of a person to a seat here. In other words, for the purposes of organization we have adopted the rule, as I believe all legislative bodies have, that prima facie evidence shall be considered as conclusive. But this House once organized, the reason and the necessity for that fiction ceases.

The House once organized, the reason and necessity for considering prima facie evidence as conclusive evidence no longer exist; and under the powers given by the Constitution to judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of the members of this House we have not only the power but it is our duty to explain, and if need be contradict, the prima facie evidence offered, and to examine all the papers relating to the prima facie case. Certainly what I have mentioned relates to the prima facie case.

But it is said that we can not go behind the certificate. We all admit this one thing, that if the certificate of the governor of the State of Mississippi had stated that Manning was duly elected, and in that connection had also stated facts that were inconsistent with his election, we would be bound to take those facts into consideration; we could not ignore those facts, because they were on the face of the certificate.

Suppose that in addition to issuing the certificate in due form and signing his name to it declaring that Mr. Manning was duly elected, the governor of the State of Mississippi had attached to it another paper giving the steps he took in arriving at that conclusion, and we found that the facts therein recited were inconsistent with the statement that Mr. Manning had been elected, would we not be compelled to take notice of those facts? Certainly we would.

What is this case? Mr. Manning comes into this House holding in his right hand a certificate of election issued by the governor of the State of Mississippi, while in his left hand he holds his answer to the notice of contest by Mr. Chalmers. The certificate says that Mr. Manning was duly elected; his own answer says that the returns show that he was not elected. Are we not bound to take notice of this fact? Can we sit here and say that we do not know that he was not entitled to that certificate? Can we shelter ourselves behind a certificate which the party holding it himself says ought never to have been issued to him? I do not know what other people may think, but I will never vote to do so. The question is, Can we afford to do it under the circumstances? I do not think we can. It would not look well, and it would not sound well. I may be mistaken about this matter; but I am sincere, and that satisfies me.

Mr. COOK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. No; because I have an idea now. [Laughter.]

It is said that we cannot go behind the certificate. As I have already intimated, a man can impeach his own title to a seat in this House. I believe there is a case reported in McCrary—the case of Hunt vs. Chilcott—where the certificate was plain on its face, but the party introduced the governor as a witness in support of the certificate, and the governor stated facts which were not consistent with the certificate. So it is in this case. Mr. Manning has by his own admissions impeached his own title. It is with us not simply a question of law, as we have supreme power to deal with such questions under the Constitution, but it is a matter of honor to say whether we will seat a man on a certificate that he himself says should not have been issued.

I come now to the next question: Is Mr. Chalmers entitled to the seat? I say no. Why? Because, as the report says, he has not the credentials. But in the next place the certificate from Tate County on which he relies is capable of different constructions. I mean that one man looking at it may come to one conclusion and another man to another. In other words, there is no definite, undisputed statement as to the fact that Mr. Chalmers received so many votes in that county.

But some one may say Mr. Manning admits that Mr. Chalmers was elected. That does not make any difference. The admissions of Manning cannot inure to the benefit of Chalmers. He may by his own admissions impeach his own title; but he cannot by his admissions seat another man. The power to do that belongs elsewhere.

Believing then that neither of these parties should be sworn in, what should we do? I say, for one, let this case rest where Mr. Manning by his words and his actions placed it. Let us decide it on its merits, and rid ourselves of this complication. Gentlemen on the other side insist on following a rule which I believe would be contrary to right and contrary to our consciences. Let the case be determined on its merits; and then, if we find Mr. Manning was elected, he and all his friends will be vindicated.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DAVIS] yield the remainder of his time or does he surrender the floor entirely?

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. I reserve the residue of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one-half hour remaining.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to address this House under very peculiar circumstances, because it is the first time in my life that I have ever had the opportunity of presenting my views upon any great question before the American people. Being a young man, it is natural that I should feel some degree of diffidence in approaching so great a question as that now before us, especially when I know that I confront the views of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY], who now sits before me. But, Mr. Speaker, I believe that when a man accepts the trust of being a member of this the most august body in the world, it becomes his province and his duty to assert before the people what he believes to be right.

I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DAVIS] has totally misunderstood and misconceived the question involved in this controversy. It is not a controversy of fact; it is a question of law. It is a controversy involving the right prima facie of a man to hold a seat in the American Congress as the Representative of a sovereign State. That is the question, and the only one.

It is not a question now as to who was elected; it is not a question now as to who received the most votes, or who has been duly elected. The question is, who has been returned; who has received the certificate of the proper legal authorities of the sovereign State of Mississippi? This is not a question, as I have heard suggested outside of this House, whether the claimant on the one side or the other is an apostate Democrat or an ex-confederate renegade, or whether Chalmers is a "prototype of saintly virtues" or Manning a "pattern of the basest turpitude," or whether the hard earnings of the clerks and other employés of the Government should be used to bring into disrepute the elective franchise and thereby disgrace the free electors of a sovereign State. If members will keep in mind the question thus fairly and squarely stated they will have no difficulty in arriving at a just conclusion and a righteous judgment. And I repeat, the question is whether Mr. Manning or Mr. Chalmers has the certificate in due form of the governor of the State of Mississippi, the governor being the constituted authority to issue such certificate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the proof may show Mr. Manning was elected, the proof may show that Mr. Chalmers was elected, or the proof may show that neither was elected. But that is not the question here. The simple, isolated, and only question to be considered is the prima facie case. That was what this House referred to the committee. It referred that, and that alone. If you step beyond that question and go into the merits of the case, you will thereby raise an issue which was not raised in the resolution referring this question to the committee on Elections.

I maintain, in the language of our report, the constitutional right of the second Congressional district of Mississippi to representation on this floor:

> It is admitted that her citizens voted at the proper time and places, that her officers did all the law required them to do, from the beginning to the issuance of the proper certificate of election; indeed, that all was done there that was done in any district in the United States.
> It is further admitted that Mr. Manning is here, her duly accredited Representative. His credentials are from the proper authority, perfect in form, and verified under the great seal of the sovereign State of Mississippi.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in this connection I desire to read from Mr. McCrary on Elections a part of section 208, page 190, he being the recognized authority in this country upon such questions. He says:

> It is enough for a prima facie case if the certificate comes from the proper officer of the State and clearly shows that the person claiming under it has been duly elected, by the officer or board on whom the law of the State has imposed the duty of ascertaining and declaring the result.
> No form for a certificate is required by the laws of Mississippi. Hence the criticisms and reflections made by gentlemen in regard to the certificate, or to the form thereof, are wholly without foundation.

The secretary of state certified, as it was his duty under the law, to the governor the result of his canvass of the returns. The governor then had no other alternative but to issue the certificate of election. This he properly did and gave the certificate to the contestee. The certificate is in exactly the same words and figures as the certificate of every other member from Mississippi who now holds his seat upon this floor.

There is no one now occupying a seat from the second district of Mississippi. In view of that fact it is highly important that some one should have the seat pending the contest upon the merits.

The very genius and theory of a republic like ours is to have all its inhabitants and every inch of its territory represented, for otherwise the people's interest might be jeopardized.

I will quote again, Mr. Speaker, from Mr. McCrary, section 221:

> There can be no doubt but that a certificate, whether rightfully or wrongfully given, confers upon the person holding it the prima facie right to the office.

The resolution of the House instructed us to inquire into and report upon the prima facie case pending the contest upon the merits. If we consider any part of the evidence, we go into the merits and do that which the House did not authorize us to do.

Our duty was to report immediately upon the prima facie case so that the district might have representation pending the contest upon the merits. We all know how long and difficult it is to have cases determined upon their merits. There are many cases of contest, each one pressing the committee for immediate action; hence the necessity for deciding upon the prima facie case in order that the district may have representation.

I know that certain gentlemen upon the committee argue that the resolution referring this matter to the Committee on Elections enlarged the powers of the committee in its order of reference. But that is altogether a mistake, because pending the debate upon the resolution my distinguished friend and colleague [Mr. BLACKBURN] stated that the reference was upon the prima facie case alone; and the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] repeated the words "prima facie" after him and agreed to that as the meaning of the resolution.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that being settled as the question referred to us, the authorities are unbroken and abundant to sustain the position assumed by the minority in their report.

I now call the attention of the House to the work of Mr. McCrary, sections 204, 208, 210, 212, and 216. These sections establish the following propositions:

> Where two or more persons claim the same office, and where a judicial investigation is required to settle the contest upon its merits, it is often necessary to determine which of the claimants shall be permitted to qualify, and to exercise the functions of the office pending such investigation. If the office were to remain vacant pending the contest, it might frequently happen that the greater part of the term would expire before it could be filled, and thus the interests of the people might suffer for want of the services of a public officer, &c. * * *
> These considerations have made it necessary to adopt and adhere to the rule that the person holding the ordinary credentials shall be qualified and allowed to act pending a contest, and until a decision can be had upon the merits. It is enough for a prima facie case if the certificate comes from the proper officer of the State, and clearly shows that the person acting under it has been adjudged to be duly elected by the officer or board on whom the law of the State has imposed the duty of ascertaining and disclosing the result. Where the statute gives the governor of the State the power and makes it his duty to commission the person elected to an office, the issuing of a commission by him confers a vested right upon the person commissioned which nothing but a judicial decision can take away. But, of course, a commission given by the governor does not oust the jurisdiction of the proper tribunal in a contested-election case. It is simply evidence of the right to hold the office; gives color to the acts of the incumbent, and constitutes him an officer de facto. * * * The person duly commissioned must exercise the functions of the office until, upon an investigation upon the merits, it is judicially determined otherwise. This decision of the House appears to have been based upon the following grounds: First, that the certificate of election signed by the governor was in due form and declared the election of Simpson, and that the House should not look beyond it in deciding the prima facie case.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the law being so overwhelmingly in favor of the contestee, I do not see how it is possible for any gentleman to hesitate for a moment in saying who is entitled to the seat prima facie pending the contest upon the merits. We must have some standard by which the Clerk who makes up the roll of the House must be guided, and that standard is the certificate issued by the proper authorities. It may in some cases be abused and may work hardships, but it is better to fix a universal and unvarying rule that may be at times abused than to have none at all, or a standard that can and may be changed every two years, as the political complexion of the House may change, and cases come up affecting this or that political party.

I believe in uniformity—in fixed and inexorable principles, like the laws of the Medes and Persians. The people want stability—something that when once learned will not be changed by every mere pretext, but only after mature reflection and calm deliberation.

What can be better than to follow the easy line of precedents—precedents that run back through all deliberative bodies from the dawn of civilization to the present time. Let the contestee have the seat; if wrong has been done, this Congress will be swift to right it when the merits are considered.

I am an old-time Democrat; in my early youth I studied the rock-ribbed principles of the fathers of the Republic, and learned to love and admire them. I believe with the "Mill-boy of the Slashes" that this is the grandest, fairest fabric of human government that ever arose to animate the hopes of civilized man. I believe in the Jeffersonian doctrine that the General Government should move in the orbit allotted to it by the Constitution and the States in the orbit allotted to them by the same instrument, so that the Government may come down the stream of time in the same pristine purity in which it came from the hands of our fathers. [Applause.]

I believe in the doctrine of State rights. I believe that they have the right to say who shall commission their officers, and when the State speaks through the statutes of its Legislature this Congress is bound by it, so far as a member's certificate is concerned. It is certainly preferable to trust to the executive of a State than to trust to a partisan clerk of this House as to who should be put upon the roll of membership. The duties of the clerk in making up the roll are prescribed by law, and he is bound to follow the law, and is allowed no discretion whatever as to whether or not he will place on the rolls the name of a man who comes with a proper certificate, such as Mr. Manning now holds, from the governor of his State. I think there should be as there is (but in this case it is attempted to change it) a fixed law by which a man when he comes to the Capitol would know whether he was armed with the proper credentials to entitle him to a seat upon this floor.

The majority of the committee by their report say that Chalmers, the contestant, has no prima facie right to the seat because he has no certificate. The certificate, therefore, as it would seem from their reasoning, must of itself constitute a prima facie case; for Chalmers, they say, with the exception of not holding a certificate of election, has a perfect prima facie right to the seat. If the certificate makes a prima facie case, as they admit, then Manning's prima facie right to the seat must have accrued at the time he received the certificate, and so the majority admit that his prima facie right was perfect at the time he received notice of the contest.

They claim, however, that his answer to the notice of contest contained certain admissions that overthrew his prima facie right. This can not be true for many reasons, a few of which are as follows:

First. Because in passing upon the prima facie case we have no right to consider the evidence in the case relating to the merits of the contest, and admissions, whether made outside or solemnly made in a pleading filed in court, are merely evidence to be considered upon the merits of the contest.

Second. But even upon the merits of the case it has been universally held that no admissions, however solemnly made by a party holding a certificate, can transfer the right to the seat from himself to another party, because the people have rights that he can not barter or admit away.

A man who is voted for by the people at an election for Congressman and receives the certificate of the governor of the State declaring him elected has no right to say: "Although I was voted for by the people of this district and the governor has certified that I was elected; although my opponent has no certificate of election, without which he can not take a seat in Congress; although this district will have no representation if I do not take my seat; notwithstanding all this I admit that the governor made a mistake as to my being elected, and I will decline to take my seat, and will thus leave this district without representation."

A man who asks his fellow-citizens for their votes to elect him to Congress and receives the governor's certificate that he is elected to that office has no right to judge whether or not he is elected. The law places that power in other hands, and all of his admissions amount to nothing so far as his right to his seat is concerned. The people have a right to be represented by some one, and he is the only man who can, according to law, represent them.

The only question submitted to us was for us to report on the prima facie case between the two gentlemen who now seek to hold a seat here. The House required us to report immediately on that question, not that we should defer it, not that we should go into the merits of it, but that we should report, on that paper presented to the House, which one of these gentlemen was entitled prima facie to a seat in this House.

We have done so; but, unfortunately for the committee, some of them have been led into the trap of considering, on a question of law, facts which ought not to be considered on it. For I contend when a man steps out of the case into the facts under the resolution he trenches upon the domain of the demagogue, and his remarks ought not to be considered as worth anything on the legal proposition.

Law is one thing, politics is another; and I, for one, so long as I am a member of the Committee on Elections, expect to stand up to what I conceive to be the law of the case, regardless of whom it hurts; because I believe, Mr. Speaker, that law ought to be justice, and politics statesmanship.

But it does seem to me that some men in considering this case have tried to warp it into a political question. They have tried to make it appear that the Republicans on the one side and the Democrats on the other were so many antagonistic opponents. That is not the legal status of the case, because the committee were equally divided. Now, the committee is constituted of lawyers, and therefore ought to be, at least, all men of good character, but on a given case they are all liable to differ in reference to the facts.

But I do not intend to delay this House by any extended remarks, because I know it would be useless. I believe the members of this House have already made up their minds one way or the other, and I could not convince them.

I appeal to gentlemen on the other side of the House not to vote to establish a precedent that, once established, will render the commission of a member to a seat upon this floor a nullity—that will make the organization of this House depend upon the whim or caprice of the party in the majority. Rising above the sordid plane of partisanship, say to Manning by your votes: "The certificate may have been wrongfully granted to you, but it has been granted, and under it you are entitled to your seat."

In the language, Mr. Speaker, of the report of the minority, I do protest against the conclusions of the majority, believing, as I do, that they are at war with reason, with all precedents, and with the fundamental right of representation.

I go further, and say that to deny to Mr. Manning his seat under the circumstances is enough to make modest sympathy weep at the thought; stern judgment startles at the idea and reason turns abashed at the absurdity. I will go even further than that, and in the classic language of my distinguished friend, the recently elected Senator from Kentucky, Mr. BLACKBURN [applause], I will say that Mr. Manning's credentials are as pure, as unsoiled, as regular as though they were borne by an angel hand from heaven itself and bearing the sign-manual of Jehovah. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I know this is a matter of grave and great importance, and therefore I will yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER].

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the resolution offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania for the reason that it seems to me quite clear that the report of the Committee on Elections was not responsive to the resolution of this House.

The committee reports, after citing the resolution under which the case was referred to them:

> This action of the House was either a refusal of the seat to Mr. Manning by the House on the usual evidence of the governor's certificate or it was a renunciation by him of his right to demand such seat upon the governor's certificate alone; perhaps it was both.

Now it seems to me very clear that this sentence in the report was written under a grave misapprehension of the intention of the House and under an equal misapprehension of the action of Mr. Manning. Did the House by this resolution decide that Mr. Manning was not entitled to the seat? Is there anybody in the House who supposed when the resolution was passed that we were passing a final judgment upon the question as to whether Mr. Manning was or was not entitled to his seat? Beyond any doubt no person can maintain that when that resolution passed the House intended to decide the case. Therefore I say that the first clause of this sentence was drawn by the committee under a grave misapprehension of the intention of the House.

The intention of the House, Mr. Speaker, was to refer one phase of this controversy to the Committee on Elections and not to decide upon the question at all. The report says:

> Or it was a renunciation by him of his right to demand such seat upon the governor's certificate alone.

What pretension can there be that this statement of the committee is correct? On the other hand, the whole transaction was—what? Why it was a submission of a right to a court competent to decide it; and how can it be maintained that the submission of a right to a court for judgment is a renunciation of the right itself?

But there is another section of this report which shows into what confusion the committee fell:

> Guided by the instructions of the House.

That language refers to the view taken by the committee that they were to examine into the merits of the case, because the second paragraph of the report, on the second page, uses this language:

> Pursuing the instructions of the House, we find from the papers.

And then they proceed to make a recital of facts which relate to the merits.

Under the same misapprehension they say:

> Guided by the instructions of the House.

That is, that they were to examine into, not the prima facie case, but into the merits.

They tell us that—> having considered carefully the documentary evidence referred to us, we are unable to agree that Mr. Manning should be seated upon his prima facie title.

We find here that there was a prima facie title, but say that they are unable to find that the member should be seated upon the prima facie title. Was it the intention of the House by its resolution to submit any question of that sort to the committee? Is it not perfectly clear from the language of the resolution that the House only asked the committee to tell the House who had the prima facie right? Beyond any question. The committee fell into gross confusion when they rendered the inconsistent judgment which they do render by telling us that Mr. Manning has the prima facie right to the seat, but should not take it.

Now let us examine a little into this question of prima facie title. What is a prima facie title to a seat in this House? A prima facie title must rest simply upon the certificate of election which the claimant to a seat brings with him when he attends a session of Congress. The prima facie title can relate to nothing but the certificate. The questions with regard to a certificate, however, may be very numerous. It may be that the certificate is not issued by the proper authority. It may be that the certificate is not correct in form. It may be that the certificate is a forgery.

I now believe I have substantially stated all the grounds which the House of Representatives ought to permit to be considered in impeachment of the certificates held by a person claiming a seat upon this floor. Is the certificate granted by the competent authority? Is it correct in form? Is it genuine? Otherwise we fall into confusion here of the most disastrous character. If there is to be any other rule I can not see why the Clerk in making up the roll of members may not go into the questions into which the committee have gone when he considers the question of the prima facie title. The Clerk is bound to make up the roll upon the prima facie titles; he is not to consider anything else whatever; and all that we referred to the committee and all that there was upon which we asked judgment of that committee was the question of the prima facie title.

It may be said, "But these papers contain something else beside the prima facie title." And so they do. But the committee should not have considered any matter that happened to be in the documents before them which did not relate to the prima facie title. And here I will call attention to a very curious confusion into which this case has fallen. How does all this matter considered by the committee appear here? Does it appear on the face of the certificate? Does it appear in documents that accompany the certificate? Not at all. Even Mr. Manning's admission, of which so much has been made, appears here through documents presented by Mr. Chalmers to the Clerk and by him transmitted to the committee. In other words, we are here permitting the governor's certificate to be impeached by extrinsic matters introduced by a person in no way connected with the governor's certificate nor in any way, according to the committee's report, connected with the prima facie title; for they find that Mr. Chalmers has no prima facie title. And so they are permitting a person not connected with the prima facie title, not a pretender even to the prima facie title, to introduce entirely extrinsic matter. And they are considering this extrinsic matter in impeachment of the prima facie title.

Now, what has been the action of this House in similar cases? This House in a case which came here from the State of Texas and was considered January 10, 1872, known as the Clark case, had before it a certificate with the impeaching matter in the body of the certificate. The governor himself, in the body of the certificate, wrote down the facts which were relied upon to impeach the title of the claimant to his seat; and this House, then under the control of the gentlemen who are now in the political minority here, struck out of the consideration of the case, struck out even from the governor's certificate, all the matter which was introduced there which they held to be extrinsic to the prima facie title. And yet we are asked here to permit a prima facie title to be impeached by matter not in the governor's certificate, but which has been introduced here by a gentleman as to whom the committee report that he is an absolute stranger to the prima facie title.

If my position in this matter is correct, and I do not believe that this view of the law can be successfully controverted, there is only one other thing to consider; and I admit that in entering upon it at all I am somewhat following the example of those who sustain the report of the committee and go beyond the record. But there seems to me to be such a misapprehension as to the force of the particular testimony to which I now refer that I ought to express my views about it.

Our friends upon the other side of this controversy seem to regard the whole matter as concluded by what they call the admission of Mr. Manning. Now, an admission is high evidence beyond any doubt, but an admission even as to a point material to a controversy is frequently not conclusive and may always be explained.

There are some States whose courts refuse to receive certain admissions. I believe that ever since the organization of the State in which I live the courts have uniformly refused to receive a plea of guilty from a person charged with a capital offense. I have myself seen standing at the bar, apparently in the possession of full faculties, a man of considerable intelligence asking to have entered his plea of guilty to an indictment for murder, and a stern judge refused it, saying: "You do not know whether you are guilty or not. You know that you have committed the homicide; but whether that is murder under our laws you do not know. I refuse to accept your plea."

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield ten minutes more to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I mention this as an illustration of how even in the constant and uniform administration of the law the courts under certain circumstances refuse to accept a man's admission as conclusive against him. But it is clear that the admission made by Mr. Manning can have no relation whatever to this controversy in its present stage. Can it be pretended here that a man can by his own admission determine whether he was elected a member of this House? Can it be held that a man by his own admission can conclude the question as to whether he was elected or some one else was elected? It must be perfectly clear, after a moment's consideration, that if it is possible for a man by his own admission to conclude the question as to whether he was elected or not, we might fall into great confusion, and we might, under certain circumstances, be the victims of collusion and evil practices.

The result of an election is a matter of the highest public concern, and it is not competent for the person who happens to be the individual most personally interested to determine a question in which the public have so great a concern. Not only has every elector of a Congressional district an interest, not only has the district as a collective body of citizens an interest, but the State has an interest, and all the States have an interest, that questions of this sort should not be determined by personal admission, but should be determined by a tribunal competent to judge, and upon this question there is but one tribunal competent to judge, and that is the House of Representatives, which by the Constitution is made the sole authority to pass upon questions of this kind.

A friend sitting near me makes a suggestion, which I will not put precisely in the form in which he states it: Suppose in a case of the most important public controversy relating to the holding of an official place which ever happened in this country—suppose that President Hayes had made his appearance here and said, "I have not been elected to this office." Would that have made any difference? Would the answer to him not have been: "If you think you were not elected to the office of President, and do not mean to assume it, there is but one thing for you to do, and that is to resign the office?" It could not have been tolerated that even the man most concerned should have been permitted to reverse the formal action of the two Houses of Congress in declaring who had been chosen.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Will my friend pardon an inquiry just here?

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Certainly.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. The gentleman has alluded to the action of the electoral commission. Let me ask him if the electoral commission, instead of having merely the power possessed by the two Houses of Congress, had had the authority, in the language of this resolution, to determine "whether upon the prima facie case as presented by said papers" Mr. Hayes or Mr. Tilden was elected to the office of President, does not the gentleman think that the history of that commission would have been reversed?

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I do not think it would have been; no. [Laughter.] Irrelevant as the question of the gentleman seems to be in this discussion, I will say that the question as to who would be decided to have been elected President was settled when that commission was constituted. In saying this I do not wish to make any unnecessarily severe reflection upon the men who composed the majority of that commission, for I believe that the question submitted to them was one of those questions which, according to our poor human nature, must be decided under the influences which governed that tribunal.

I was proceeding to say that it is not competent for a member of this House to foreclose such a question as this by any admission that he may make. I find very apt language sustaining my position used by a very distinguished member of the Senate, Mr. GARLAND. In the controversy as to a seat in the Senate, to which Kellogg and Spofford were parties, he said:

> Suppose Kellogg and Spofford had agreed and filed a written stipulation, as in courts of justice, that a judgment should be rendered in favor of Spofford against Kellogg; the Senate could not have rendered the judgment. You can not default an American constituency in that way. You can not stipulate the rights of an American constituency away in any tribunal.

I think that to be the law. The right to represent a Congressional district can not be impaired nor in any way affected by the admissions of the claimant, except that when the merits of the question come to be considered, and we come to determine who is finally entitled to the seat, we would be justified in taking into consideration admissions as to facts which either of the claimants may have made against himself.

Mr. HENLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I will.

Mr. HENLEY. I am in considerable incertitude in regard to one proposition, and I believe many on this floor participate with me in that. The question I desire to ask is this: Suppose a man presents himself to this House with the certificate of the governor of his State in due form and makes this declaration: "I notify the House that if they desire it, after the statement I have made, I am willing to be sworn in; but I declare, however, to the House that I procured my election by perjury and by improper and unlawful practices." The question is whether by sending that gentleman to this House the State has not delegated to him authority to confess himself out of court?

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I think clearly not. I would say in further answer to the gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY] that if a newly elected member should rise and make such a statement, the first comment to be made upon it would be that it was a very impertinent statement, and had no real relation to the business of the House. He might refuse to take the oath; that rests with himself. But if the House were compelled to pass upon the question, and the certificate was correct in form, beyond any doubt the House would be compelled to give him his seat, and to let him go before the Committee on Elections on the question of merits or to resign his seat.

Mr. HENLEY. The gentleman understands that I do not intend by that to impute any such admission on the part of General Manning.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAMMOND). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBERTSON. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has twenty-five minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT].

Mr. HERBERT. I shall endeavor to confine myself to the record and to bring the House back to the record. In limine, the question between those who believe that Mr. Manning ought to be seated on his certificate and those who believe that the majority report of the Committee on Elections ought to be adopted lies right here. Were all the papers which the committee considered, outside of the certificate, properly before it? Were any of those papers, independently of any House resolution, legal evidence and properly to be considered in deciding upon the question of prima facie right to the seat?

If we find that those papers were not legal evidence of themselves, then the only other question is, did the resolution of the House have the effect to make them evidence? I believe, and shall attempt to maintain before this House, that Mr. McPherson, the Republican Clerk of the House of the Forty-seventh Congress, had before him and considered every single paper which this committee was authorized to consider either by the law or by the resolution of the House referring the question to them.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. The Clerk did not have the certificate in this case before him.

Mr. HERBERT. He had every paper except this particular certificate; and he did have certificates exactly like this one, and he did decide upon those certificates. I am correct in that. It is a rule of law that the decision of any question is the decision of every subsequent question falling in consimili casu—in the same predicament. Therefore we may assume that the Clerk had before him the certificate of Mr. Manning, because he decided that the certificates of all the other members from Mississippi which were in totidem verbis were legal and proper evidence of a prima facie case.

Now I say—and I propose to prove it by this record, by the debates which took place in this House before that resolution was adopted—that the Committee on Elections has misunderstood the scope and intent of the question committed to it by that resolution. If I establish this position, that is the end of the case.

Every gentleman who has spoken in favor of the majority report has admitted that the certificate issued in this case to Mr. Manning and now presented here on his behalf or with his consent is regular in form. Some gentlemen say that he should have presented himself with that certificate to be sworn in. Everybody knows that this certificate was presented with his consent, for it was so stated upon the floor of the House. Clerk McPherson had before him four different papers filed by Mr. Chalmers with him. My first proposition is that these four papers, and these alone, went by resolution of the House to the Committee on Elections. I propose to prove that by the debates which preceded the adoption of the resolution.

In the report of the majority we find them starting out with the proposition that the committee in order to find what the resolution meant ought to look to the debates which preceded its adoption; and after quoting from the debates, after stating that Mr. Manning had requested the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] to introduce the resolution, they draw from this fact—to be found not at all in the resolution but in the debates which preceded its adoption—the conclusion that the action of the House in adopting the resolution "was either a refusal by the House to seat Mr. Manning on the usual evidence or it was a renunciation by Mr. Manning of the right to demand such seat on the governor's certificate alone;" and they say "perhaps it was both." Now, they draw these extraordinary conclusions, I say, from the debates which took place prior to the adoption of the resolution.

One single remark to gentlemen of the committee on these extraordinary conclusions. You say, gentlemen, that when an applicant for a seat upon this floor refers to you the question whether or not he has a right to the seat, that is a renunciation, and you are bound to decide against him merely because he selected you as a committee to consider the question. Why, sir, suppose a plaintiff when called upon to look on the jury says he is content, he is satisfied with the panel, what would you think of that jury if they should say "because the plaintiff in the case chose us to decide his case, therefore we will decide it against him?"

Then, again, allow me a word on the other conclusion which the committee announce, that this resolution was a decision by the House not to seat Mr. Manning on the prima facie case alone.

Do you think it a fair conclusion that because the House, having under discussion the claim of Mr. Manning to a seat on this floor on what he alleged is a prima facie case, finally referred it to you just as a chancellor would direct an issue out of chancery to be tried by a jury, therefore you must decide against Mr. Manning? Excepting courts-martial, which generally seem to act on the idea that they are organized to convict, this Elections Committee is the only body I ever heard of the members of which came to the conclusion that because a question was referred to them they were bound to decide it in a particular way. In fact, they go rather beyond courts-martial in this regard; for I never heard of a military court stating in its finding that it convicted a prisoner because the general sent him before them; but here is a committee stating that a resolution of the House referring to them the question of Manning's right to a seat was a refusal by the House of Manning's right to be seated.

Mr. ADAMS of New York, and Mr. BELFORD rose.

Mr. HERBERT. I hope gentlemen will not interrupt me. I have already wandered a little from my line of argument, and shall perhaps be crowded for time within which to finish it.

Now, what was it the House did refer? What was it that was debated in this House? What were the questions at issue? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] proposed a resolution that Mr. Manning should be sworn in. When that proposition was made—I read from the appendix to the report, where I find an abstract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the proceedings—when that proposition was made the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] said:

> Mr. Speaker, I desire to have read in this connection, and with the same purpose, the other papers which have been filed with the Clerk—papers in the nature of certificates showing the result of the election—all the papers pertaining to this matter.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS], speaking on the same question, said:

> The question of order I make is this: The Clerk has stated to the House that there are other papers, certificates filed by General Chalmers claiming this seat; and that statement having been made, the House, before it swears in either of these gentlemen on the prima facie case, has the right to have those certificates read.

And again:

> Mr. CALKINS. We have the statement of the Clerk that certificates have been filed in his office and a request made that General Chalmers be sworn in upon those certificates; but the Clerk refused to put his name on the roll and submitted the question—very properly—to the House. This is the first stage at which the question which I now present could be raised; and I wish to save that question, because if the reading of those certificates be in the nature of debate the motion for the previous question would cut off the right to have them read.

And again we find on the second day:

> Mr. KEIFER. Does not the gentleman include in it the prima facie right of Mr. Chalmers?
> Mr. CONVERSE. I will embrace in my proposition the suggestion that the papers which have been filed with the Clerk be directed to be placed in the hands of the committee when appointed.
> Mr. KEIFER. But let the other case go there too, as suggested by the gentleman from New York.
> Mr. MORRISON. There is not any other case.
> Mr. KEIFER. There is another case. The papers on file with the Clerk show the fact.

And still further down we find what the friends of the two claimants agreed on:

> Mr. KEIFER. The objection we make is that it is proposed to refer the prima facie right of one gentleman only, not both. By the papers here—by the certificates from the secretary of state of Mississippi—the result of the vote is shown absolutely. Let both cases go to the committee. They can be trusted to report upon the question whether Mr. Chalmers or Mr. Manning is entitled to the seat——
> Mr. BLACKBURN. Prima facie.
> Mr. KEIFER. Prima facie.
> Mr. BLACKBURN. That is all fair.
> Mr. KEIFER. That is all we ask. If the gentleman will include the two we make no further objection.
> Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is agreed.
> The SPEAKER. Of course if there is objection this debate is out of order. The Chair is indulging it upon the supposition that some agreement may be arrived at.
> Mr. TOWNSHEND. We are all agreed.
> Mr. KEIFER. It is stated on the other side that the two cases are not here. I am informed that the certificate from the secretary of state of Mississippi—probably the only officer in the State authorized to make a certificate; we do not concede that the governor is authorized to make a certificate, and he does not himself claim that he is—the certificate of the secretary of state, regularly and properly filed here——

These extracts show conclusively what papers were being discussed, and they show an absolute agreement by all parties in the House that the papers to be referred by the resolution to the committee were the papers and only the papers filed with the Clerk; and you may read this debate from beginning to end, and you will find that nowhere was any offer ever made to have read to this House for its information, or to enable it to come to a decision, either the answer of Mr. Manning, about which so much has been said here, or the judgment of the court which appears in this report. There was not a single suggestion by any member that Mr. Manning's answer to the notice of contest should be sent to the committee. The debates show it was not thought of in that committee, and yet the committee builds its conclusion principally on that foundation.

General Chalmers himself, astute lawyer as he is, and presenting with all his ingenuity his right to a seat in this House, never for a moment thought it would be right or proper, either for the purpose of impeaching Manning's certificate or for any other purpose, to refer to the answer that Manning had made in reference to the merits of the case.

Read what the Clerk says about the case on the first page when he decided this question, and nowhere do you find any such thing was presented to him for consideration. I say, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] has said, that the Clerk, when he began to consider this question, considered it upon precisely the same rules and was bound by precisely the same laws by which the House is bound. But from the remarks of the distinguished chairman of the committee when he was discoursing so eloquently about the absolute power of the House, it would seem that in his opinion the House is not bound by any law at all.

Of course the House has power, brute power, to do anything the majority may elect to do; but, Mr. Speaker, if we desire to perpetuate our Government we will not sanction the idea for a moment that because the House has power to do a thing therefore we ought to do it. We ought to be careful, now at the end of nearly one hundred years since this Constitution was formed, now that a system of rules has been established under which for years the House has been organized with so much ease, with so much satisfaction to all parties—rules so plain, so easily understood—we ought to be careful to do nothing that will tend to sap these foundation principles of our Government. If, when the question submitted to the committee was but the simple question of the prima facie right to a seat, and nothing more, that committee claims the power, and this House approves their claim, to go hunting through an answer that relates to the merits of the case in order to cull out some single paragraph that may militate against a prima facie case, do you not expect that future Clerks of the House, when they come to making up rolls of the House and deciding on prima facie cases, will do the same thing? Will they not follow the precedent now set? Will they not, when they wish to keep a member off the roll who has a certificate, garble from the answer of a contestee something to negative his prima facie right? If you have the right to do it, any Clerk of the House has a right to do it. Are you willing to set such a precedent as that? It is not now a question of whether or not Manning is elected or Chalmers is elected. If, when the evidence comes in here, when we come to consider this question on its merits, it shall appear Chalmers was elected, I shall willingly vote to seat him. But never will I consent to set such a precedent as this.

Another word. When you look at the debates which preceded the resolution of reference you will find the questions at issue between Mr. CONVERSE on one side as the friend of Mr. Manning, and Mr. CALKINS on the other as the friend of Mr. Chalmers, were in the first place, what shall be read before the House; and in the second, what is the evidence? Some of the friends of Mr. Chalmers, notably the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], really desired, it seems, to overrule the Republican Clerk, Mr. McPherson, and seat Mr. Chalmers immediately on the very papers the Clerk had held were insufficient, for the gentleman from Ohio insisted that the whole question of the prima facie right of Mr. Chalmers, together with that of Mr. Manning, should go to the committee.

I have undertaken to show, and I think I have shown, that the only papers referred by the House to the committee were the papers which had been filed with the Clerk and on which the Clerk had rendered his decision.

My next proposition is, that the House by the resolution of reference did not intend to decide, and did not decide, whether these papers were evidence or not. That was one of the points of contention in the House and one of the points referred for decision to the committee. I read from the debate:

Mr. CONVERSE says, on page 24, speaking of the papers on file with the Clerk:

> There is but one certificate from the governor—from the executive; the other papers relate to the merits of the case.

Others had been claiming that these papers should be read. Here was Mr. CONVERSE contending that if they were read they were not evidence. Does any one suppose that Mr. CONVERSE by his resolution referring these papers to the committee intended to yield his position that they were not evidence? No, Mr. Speaker, no man can so conclude. The papers were referred to the committee that it might decide on the legality of evidence as well as the sufficiency of proof. And if this be true it does not matter what papers were referred. Clearly none of them were evidence bearing on the question of prima facie case except the certificate. I have not alluded to the wording of the resolution. It does on its face in words refer to all papers of Manning and Chalmers. But these words are to be construed with reference to the subject-matter to which they refer, to the agreement and understanding which I have shown from the debates, the papers on file with the Clerk.

That is a fair, legitimate, logical construction of that resolution in the light of that preliminary debate; and I say that the House never referred to that committee one single other paper. If it did not, then the committee did not have before it any other paper, and of course the committee had not before it this answer of Mr. Manning. But, Mr. Speaker, even if it had had that answer before it, even if the resolution were construed as broader than the House intended, even if it were construed to send to the committee all the papers that related to the merits as well as the prima facie case, I ask you this single question, do you not fear to set a precedent to future Houses and to future Clerks when they come to make up the roll of those entitled to seats upon this floor that will authorize them to hunt through every answer that may be filed, and to garble from every plea of confession and avoidance every such confession as may help them on to the conclusions they desire to reach? And I ask you if you do not fear to set such a precedent as this?

Manning admitted there had been a mistake in his favor, and then alleged that the effect of this was overcome by the frauds committed by Chalmers's friends. You take part of what he says and construe it against him. You will not wait for him to prove the truth of the other part. What is this but garbling the record?

Gentlemen, it is not an important matter to either political party on this floor just now what you do with this prima facie question. The case will soon be reported on its merits.

We heard here a sort of outside remark to-day that that case could be decided in three hours and a half on its merits. This very diligent committee will soon decide it on its merits. Neither the majority nor minority resolution proposes to seat Mr. Chalmers. One only proposes to seat Mr. Manning temporarily, leaving the question as to his right to the seat to be decided hereafter; and in a short while the question will come in from the committee and you will be called upon to decide it. Let us meet that question when it comes up. Let us not undertake to decide it now, but let us decide the question that is before us. Mr. Speaker, we Democrats on this side have an opportunity to make now, if we want to do it, a reputation for being very fair. We can make it and pay very little for it. Do we want to make a trade of that kind? Is there a gentleman on this floor influenced by such a motive, one who would sacrifice Mr. Manning because forsooth we have a large majority on this floor and do not need his vote. Certainly gentlemen are not to be influenced by considerations of that kind.

It all comes at last back to this: What was referred to the committee? Look through the debates, all the debates, all speaking only of the papers which were filed with the Clerk, and look at the resolution and see to what it refers—the resolution which was passed afterward. That, Mr. Speaker, related to the papers to which reference was made in that debate, and nothing more. Then the resolution was passed, and that referred only to the prima facie case. If it referred only to the prima facie case, was not the committee limited to the examination of that? Nothing was to be examined in the committee-room but that, and only that. Their duty, and their only duty, was to consult the precedents and follow the law.

Do any of you think, when Mr. CONVERSE said he presented that resolution and when you voted for it, that you were making evidence of what was not evidence? Is there a man here who will say that when he voted for that resolution he was aware of the fact that it was the intention of the resolution to make evidence of that which was not evidence? If there was not, then this question is to be considered precisely as it was considered by Clerk McPherson, and the question is, are you to overrule him?

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, before expressing to the House the opinions that I entertain of the question now before us, it may be necessary, and in my judgment it certainly is proper, to determine accurately what that question is. I presume that gentlemen on both sides of this House will profess at least an intention to pass upon this case without any regard to the political status of the parties, without any regard to whether they like them or dislike them, and without any regard to any other consideration than an earnest desire to discharge with impartiality the duty imposed upon them by the Constitution of their country and the obligation of their oaths to judge of the election, qualification, and return of members. That, I take it, is the purpose, as it certainly is the duty, of every member of this House.

At the beginning of this Congress every member within the sound of my voice will recollect the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] introduced a resolution which seemed designed to lead the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. Manning, up to the Clerk's desk to be sworn in. It did not seem to be the purpose of that resolution to leave it a question for his judgment; but it seemed to be in the nature of instructions to him to come up and be sworn in as a member. You all recollect the discussion that took place on that resolution. You all recollect that the friends of Mr. Chalmers objected to the resolution in its then form. You recollect the debate that took place and the adjournment that was had. As was well said by the distinguished gentleman my colleague who presides over the Committee on Elections, during that adjournment the presumption is that the voice of reason was heard; that every man looked into the case and thought of it and reflected upon it. And what was the result? Notwithstanding the previous question had been called upon the case and that call sustained by a vote of the House, the next morning, by unanimous consent, the call for the previous question was withdrawn, and the resolution, at the suggestion of some of our Republican friends, was amended. And how amended? Amended by striking out the provision for swearing in Manning and referring the contest to the Committee on Elections and instructing and authorizing that committee to determine for this House the prima facie case. Upon what? Upon the certificate of the governor of Mississippi alone? Not so. But upon that certificate and all the other papers in the possession of the House.

Why, sir, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] talked as if the Committee on Elections had surreptitiously got possession of the answer of Mr. Manning. That is not true. If you will look to the resolution of this House you will see it instructs the committee to pass upon the prima facie case as presented by all the papers, and not simply by those which had been filed with the Clerk. What should that committee have done? What was their duty?

And just here, Mr. Speaker, permit me to suggest a fact that in my judgment will account for much of the error as I believe it to be, of the fallacy as I understand it to be, of the arguments of some of the gentlemen who have spoken on this case. They talk about a prima facie title. It seems to be claimed by them that a certificate of the governor is prima facie title. I do not so understand it. I will agree with them that it is prima facie evidence of title, but I will not agree that it is the prima facie title itself. And just there, Mr. Speaker, in my judgment the error arises in the case. If it was prima facie title, then why did this House refer it to a committee?

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman read this section of McCrary's work bearing on that proposition?

Mr. CRISP. You can do that yourself.

Mr. OATES. If you permit me I would like to do so.

Mr. CRISP. I have only fifteen minutes.

Mr. OATES. The following is the statement in McCrary on Elections:

> The regular certificate of election, properly signed, is, as we have seen, to be taken as sufficient to authorize the person holding it to be sworn in. It is prima facie evidence of his election, and the only evidence thereof which can be considered in the first instance and in the course of the organization of a legislative body.

Mr. CRISP. I admit and subscribe to that fully. But my proposition was that the certificate was not prima facie title; and no gentleman knows better than the gentleman from Alabama the distinction between prima facie title and prima facie evidence of title.

Mr. HUTCHINS. It is evidence of election, not title.

Mr. CRISP. If, Mr. Speaker, that certificate was conclusive evidence of the prima facie case, as gentlemen contend, why was it submitted to the committee? What duty were the committee charged with? That certificate was read in the presence of this House. No suggestion was made by any member that it was not in due form; that it was not of like character with the certificates borne by every gentleman from Mississippi here. Why then refer it, if it was conclusive evidence on the question? I respectfully submit that the purpose of the House in that reference was to charge this committee with the duty of deciding from that certificate and all the other papers who had the prima facie case. That is what they say. What does prima facie mean? Gentlemen say it has a technical meaning. Perhaps it has. But the technical meaning is not inconsistent with and not different from its meaning as generally understood. It means, upon the first view of the case; upon the first appearance of the papers.

What should this committee do when charged with the subject? What papers should they look at? First, at the certificate of the governor. And what did that certificate say? Did it say Mr. Manning was elected? Not so. That certificate said that it appeared to the governor from the return certified to him by the secretary of state that Mr. Manning was elected.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CRISP. With pleasure.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Does not the law of Mississippi require the secretary of state to certify that fact to the governor?

Mr. CRISP. I presume it does, else the certificate would not have been made. But the gentleman does not appreciate, because I have not yet fully explained, the point I desire to make. That certificate says, "upon the return made to me by the secretary of state it appears that Van H. Manning has a majority of the votes cast." Gentlemen say that the committee had no right to look to any other evidence; that they should not go behind the certificate. I put it to you, gentlemen, as fair men, when a certificate itself refers to a document as being the predicate upon which it is issued, if the committee ought not to have looked at it. The governor's certificate says that the returns certified to him show that Mr. Manning is elected. The committee have got in their possession those very returns. Is that outside of the case? Would it not be considered on a motion in arrest of judgment, even? It is a part of the record.

Now, when we come first to the governor's certificate it alleges that the secretary of state of Mississippi certified to the governor that Mr. Manning received a majority of the votes cast. Then we come to the returns. What do we find there? I do not ask the House to go behind the returns, but I do ask members to come up to them, and when they come up to them to look at them, and not to close their eyes, and not to be classed among those who, though not blind, will not see.

Now, look upon the returns. What do they show? They show one of two things: either that the majority of the votes cast in the county of Tate was cast for Mr. Chalmers, or they show such contradiction upon their face that it was the duty of the secretary of state, and it was also the duty of the governor, to have rejected them. If the former rule should be adopted, then upon the face of these papers this certificate of the governor ought not to have been issued to Mr. Manning. If the latter rule prevails, then upon the face of the papers the certificate ought not to have been issued to Mr. Manning. That is the case as I understand it.

Now, I wish to call attention for a few moments to the case as stated by the gentlemen who represent the views of the minority of the committee. Much criticism has been made upon the report of the majority. Let me call your attention to the statement of the case as made by the minority themselves. That report says:

> If he ever had the right to take his seat upon the certificate he has that right now. The idea of the report seems to be that a plain right is annihilated because it has been submitted for affirmance. In view of all the facts we have no hesitation in commending the course pursued by Mr. Manning. His right to the certificate was in litigation in the courts of Mississippi when his answer was drawn. He denied the jurisdiction of the courts to determine it, and declared his purpose to submit it to this body, in which he maintained that exclusive jurisdiction was vested.

Now, just here: "His right"—his right to what? His right to a seat here? No. His right to the certificate was in litigation in the courts of Mississippi when his answer was drawn. Not his right to the seat, but his right to the paper which was before the Committee on Elections—the certificate of the governor. He denied the jurisdiction of the courts to determine it. To determine what? His right to that certificate. That is the question as stated by these gentlemen themselves. He denied the jurisdiction of the courts to determine it, and declared his purpose to submit it to this body. To submit what? The question of his right to that certificate. That is his declaration as set up by the gentlemen who on this floor represent the views which he is supposed to entertain.

Now, in view of that statement is not the resolution adopted by this House easily understood? Did not the House intend to meet him on the issue he himself had invoked? Did not the House intend to say to him, "Sir, inasmuch as you do not in this case claim that you should be seated upon the certificate alone, inasmuch as your right to that certificate has been questioned, we will submit that certificate and all the other papers in the case to the Committee on Elections, with instructions to report from an examination thereof who has the prima facie right to the seat."

Now, it seems to me that in that view of the case the admissions made by Mr. Manning are also proper matters for consideration by the committee. Gentlemen speak lightly of those admissions. What was the purpose of them? Why did he make them? What was the real, honest purpose of Mr. Manning when he made them? I put it to the House if it was not to declare his intention not to take his seat or claim it under the certificate until the House decided, upon the merits of the case, that he was entitled to it. He did not use the word "merits" in his admission; that I agree. But I put it to you, as honorable men, if that is not the proper construction of that admission? Let me read from the admission:

> I deny that any frauds were attempted or practiced by my friends, or that they were guilty of fraudulent or illegal practices, or that you received a majority of 1,332 votes as member of the Forty-eighth Congress from said Congressional district, though I admit that the inspectors and clerks of the several election precincts did certify to the county commissioners of election in their respective counties that you received a majority of the votes cast; and I further admit that the 1,472 votes which the commissioners of Tate County returned as cast for J. R. Chambless were in fact cast for you, and that the name Chambless was inserted in the return by clerical error instead of your name. And in this connection I state that because of said error to your prejudice I will not take a seat in said Congress or ask the Clerk to enroll my name as a member thereof until I have vindicated and the House shall have affirmed my right thereto.

Mr. Manning's right to the possession of that certificate was questioned. He will not claim under it till he vindicates his right to it. Has he vindicated it? Shall the House affirm his right to it when he admits that the returns from the several counties show that Chalmers received a majority of the votes cast? These facts and admissions were before the Committee on Elections, with instructions to report to this House upon a view thereof who was entitled to the seat. That committee reported that neither Manning nor Chalmers was entitled to be sworn in as a member. I do not see how they could have reported otherwise nor how this House can fail to sustain that report.

We are told the precedents are in favor of seating Manning. I have as much respect for the precedents of this House or the precedents of any other legislative or judicial body as any man ought to have who has been cognizant of the great injustice that has constantly been done in their name. I have that much, and I have no more. I respect precedents in election cases when they appear to me to be founded in justice and right, when they appear to me to be in the interest of the great right of the people to select their own representatives, and when they tend to secure the admission of such representatives upon the floor of this House. I can not go further than that; and if there be precedents (none such have been shown) under which a man may be seated on a certificate which he himself admits was founded upon a clerical error, upon a certificate which he himself admits was given to him when upon the face of the returns he was not entitled to it, then, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against such precedent, and feel that in so doing I am vindicating the right of self-government and the cause of truth and justice.

I undertake to say that to sustain the views of the majority of this committee will not, as seems to be apprehended by some gentlemen, endanger the right of any duly elected member to be placed upon the roll of members preliminary to the organization of a new Congress. This is an anomalous case, and that it was so regarded by the House is evidenced by the peculiar character of the resolution referring it to the Committee on Elections. Did you ever hear of one like it before? Has there ever been one like it in the past? I think not, Mr. Speaker; and permit me here to express the hope that in the time to come we may not look upon its like again.

Mr. Speaker, before I can obtain my consent to override the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections and vote to seat Mr. Manning on the facts of the case I must have a direct precedent the reasoning of which meets the approbation of my judgment. I say to you frankly that it is somewhat shocking to my sense of right and justice to be told that I must vote to seat a man upon a certificate referring to a return by the secretary of state, when it appears at the first glance at that return, the foundation of the certificate, that the certificate never ought to have been issued.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DAVIS] if he desires to take the remainder of his hour at this time?

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. Not now; I will reserve it.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I understand that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] my colleague on the Committee on Elections desires to speak this evening. Therefore, if he requests it, I will now yield him thirty minutes of my time.

Mr. LOWRY. I thank the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE] for his courtesy, but I will suggest to him that I prefer to speak in my own time when I can obtain the floor for that purpose.

I may be permitted to say, however, that when I shall speak in this case I hope to be able to show that the criticisms of some of our friends upon the action of the Committee on Elections are founded upon a want of information in reference to the basis upon which that committee predicated its action. While they have been sitting upon the horse-blocks outside, occupied with other matters, the court has been hearing arguments upon this question. [Laughter.] And the committee, having proceeded as a judicial tribunal, has arrived at a conclusion which I hope to be able to show is supported not only by the principles of parliamentary law, but by every principle of justice and of right. But I reserve any further expression upon this subject until the time which is allotted to me in the order which has been adopted.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy the floor on this question but a short time; and I ask the attention of the House.

This contest comes from the second Congressional district of Mississippi. At the election held on the 7th day of November, 1882, Van H. Manning and James R. Chalmers were the opposing candidates. It is conceded on all hands that one or the other is elected. But it appears that a certificate of election bearing the great seal of the State, and as to mere form unexceptionable, was issued by the governor of Mississippi to Mr. Manning. This certificate he never filed with the Clerk of the House. Had Mr. Manning simply lodged that certificate of election with the then Clerk of the House there is no question that his name would have been promptly placed on the roll of members-elect, and on the assembling of this Congress he would have been sworn in, as the great mass of us were, on the prima facie right. But he did not thus file his certificate, and he was not thus sworn in as prima facie the elected Representative of that second district of Mississippi. To understand this case aright the question must be answered, why was not this done? The answer is plain, patent, palpable. From the papers submitted to the committee by the solemn resolution of this House it appears that within the time allowed by law the contestant, Mr. Chalmers, served upon the contestee, Mr. Manning, notice of contest as required by law; and to this notice of contest, of which no man can question Mr. Chalmers had the right to avail himself, the contestee, as in duty bound, answered. In the Congress of the United States certain proceedings were had which have been referred to, and doubtless will be again in this debate. When, upon the assembling of this Congress, the second district of Mississippi was called, the Clerk informed the House that—

The Clerk has not enrolled the name of any one as a Representative for the second district of Mississippi, for the reason that no paper which can be considered a certificate of election in the sense of the law has been presented to him.

Thereupon, after a discussion which I need not notice at length, the House adopted the resolution under which the Committee on Elections has made the report now pending. How did that resolution come to be adopted? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] my colleague on the committee stated to the House that he introduced the resolution at the request of Mr. Manning. What does the resolution provide?

Resolved, That the certificate—

Why, sir, I have heard this question argued as if we had to consider nothing under heaven except the certificate. But, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, what did you by this resolution provide?

Resolved, That the certificate and all other papers in the contested-election case of J. R. Chalmers and Van H. Manning from the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi be referred to the Committee on Elections when appointed—with instructions to report immediately whether upon the prima facie case as presented by said papers—

For what purpose?

What papers? Not merely the certificate, but all the papers in the case—whether upon the prima facie case as presented by said papers said Manning or Chalmers is entitled to be sworn in as a member pending the contest on the merits and not to affect the final right to said seat.

That is the resolution under which the committee was instructed; that is the resolution under which we have made our report. The majority and minority report is now before you. And, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the only question really involved here and now is, whether upon all the papers submitted to the committee, and not upon the certificate alone, Mr. Manning is entitled to be sworn in as having a prima facie right to the seat.

And this case is in this respect novel and sui generis. It absolutely stands alone in the history of contested-election cases. We all know that if this were a naked question here whether Mr. Manning should be sworn in on his certificate of election, which I repeat is unexceptionable in form, there could not be two opinions. Every lawyer in this House would answer yes. But the trouble is there is something more. "All the papers" submitted, as they were, to the committee embrace and contain more than that naked certificate. They embrace the notice of contest of Chalmers and the answer of Manning; that much certainly is clear. They also embrace the tabular statement of the votes cast, not really and truly, for either side may dispute their correctness, at the election as shown by the returns received at and lodged in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Mississippi, all of which were sent to the committee. They show that in the county of Tate an election was held. That returns were made to the secretary of state from that county. They show further that prima facie Mr. Manning received 8,579 votes in the counties of Benton, De Soto, La Fayette, Marshall, Panola, Tallahatchee, Tate, and Union. They further show that in the same counties Mr. Chalmers received 8,257 votes, 322 votes less than Mr. Manning. And, going no further, that would be Mr. Manning's majority. But in the same tabular statement it appears that in the good county of Tate Mr. J. R. Chalmers did not get a single vote, while Mr. J. R. Chambless, a man in buckram, as we all know, got 1,472 votes. Now, Mr. Chalmers claims that he got those 1,472 votes; claims this in the papers submitted by this House to the committee by its solemn resolution which I have quoted. And the commissioners of election of Tate, namely, E. L. Weems, V. P. Still, and R. O. Mosby, certify as follows:

We, the undersigned, commissioners of election for Tate County, do certify that at an election held in Tate County November 7, 1882, for the office of Representative in the lower House of the Congress of the United States, Van H. Manning received in said county eleven hundred and sixty-six (1,166) votes; James R. Chalmers, fourteen hundred and seventy-two (1,472) votes; Hannibal C. Carter, three (3) votes. For the office of county surveyor of said county John E. Matthews received four hundred and fifty-five (455) votes, and Sam. F. Massey seven hundred and fifteen (715) votes; all of which fully appears by the tally-sheet on the opposite side of this page, which we certify to be a true and correct tally-sheet of the votes cast in Tate County.

Witness our signatures, November 11, A. D. 1882.

R. O. MOSBY,
Commissioners of Election of Tate County.

This, Mr. Speaker, was upon one side of a sheet of paper. On the other side of the same sheet was a tally-sheet or detailed statement, which I here append:

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. PETTIBONE. Certainly.

Mr. OATES. I read from McCrary:

There can be no doubt——

Mr. PETTIBONE. Oh, I know all about that.

Mr. OATES. Let me read the paragraph.

Mr. PETTIBONE. It has been read over and over again. I am willing to yield to the gentleman for a question, but if he wishes to read law he must read it in his own time, and I think he needs to read a good deal, considering the position he takes in this case. [Laughter.]

Now, let us not forget that upon this same document, the document from Tate County, there appears the indorsement of the secretary of state that "the foregoing two pages contain a true and correct transcript"—of what? Of the certificate, together with the tally-sheet or detailed statement, of the vote of Tate County. Now, prima facie, what appears? This is one of the papers which the House directed the committee to examine. Unless you intended us to consider the other papers in the case why did you not send to us merely the certificate? Prima facie it appears from this document, which was one of the papers transmitted to the committee by the resolution of this House, that the commissioners of Tate County over their own signatures say in words, not in Arabic figures merely, that in that county J. R. Chalmers—whom we all know—got 1,472 votes. The detailed statement on the other side says briefly: "For Congress, second district, J. R. Chambless, 1,472."

What does prima facie mean? At first view—"that evidence which is sufficient to establish the fact, unless rebutted." Considered in this light alone, who will undertake to say that "the tally-sheet or detailed statement" shall override for an instant the certificate to which the commissioners of election solemnly affixed their signs-manual in obedience to their sworn duty?

But, Mr. Speaker, in addition to this paper, which, prima facie, it would seem, is sufficient to determine the matter if it is to be considered at all, or if any paper but the certificate of the governor is to be considered, we have the notice of contest and the answer thereto. These papers were before the committee, sent to them by a resolution of this House. In his notice I find the following specific charge by Mr. Chalmers:

That when the secretary of state canvassed the returns in contempt of a writ of prohibition from the judge of the ninth judicial district of Mississippi, he illegally and fraudulently counted 1,472 votes from Tate County for J. R. Chambless that were certified to have been cast for James R. Chalmers, under pretense that the tally-sheet was the essential part of the return, although the returns from Union, Tippah, and De Soto Counties, where you have majorities certified, have no tally-sheet accompanying the certificate.

Now, we all know how Mr. Manning replied to this in his answer. But let us read it in this connection. Here it is:

I further admit that the 1,472 votes which the commissioners of Tate County returned as cast for J. R. Chambless were in fact cast for you, and that the name "Chambless" was inserted in the return by clerical error instead of your name.

And in this connection I state that because of said error to your prejudice I will not take a seat in said Congress or ask the Clerk to enroll my name as a member thereof until I have vindicated and the House shall have affirmed my right thereto.

He admits, it will be seen, fully, clearly, distinctly, that Chalmers was entitled to 1,472 votes which were not counted for him by the secretary of state. He further gives him notice that "I will not take a seat in said Congress or ask the Clerk to enroll my name as a member thereof until I have vindicated and the House shall have affirmed my right thereto." What did he mean by this language? He meant that the 1,472 votes which the secretary of state wrongfully failed to count for Chalmers would prima facie have turned the scale. He meant that he would not ask the Clerk to put his name on the roll; and we know he did not. He meant he would not take a seat in this body until he had vindicated his right to a seat here bona fide; not that he would seek to be sworn in on a certificate which he felt, as he declares, in honor bound not to present. But bona fide, rather than prima facie, he would vindicate his right. I say, sir, let him do it!

Now, Mr. Speaker, I plant myself on the case of Hunt vs. Chilcott. What was decided in that case? Whoever comes here with a certificate of election unimpeached has undoubtedly a prima facie right to a seat. But on the question whether a man can impeach his own prima facie case—and on this I challenge the attention of the lawyers of this House—it has been decided in the case of Hunt vs. Chilcott that a man can do this. This House has solemnly decided that it can be done. Now, in this case a man comes here and says, "I admit that there are 1,472 votes which ought to have been counted for my opponent, and if they had been counted for him I would not have received the certificate; and I will never take my seat in the House, I will never ask the House to give me a seat until, without reference to the certificate, I shall have vindicated my right." Why, sir, do gentlemen seek to "vindicate" this man's right by now swearing him in? Is he to be taken to that desk squirming and squealing like a babe unwilling to take a dose of medicine and sworn in willy-nilly—whether he wants to be or not? He has told you he does not want to be sworn in upon the certificate, and has asked to have the papers referred to the Committee on Elections.

Now, I say that a man can impeach his own prima facie title; I say that Mr. Manning emphatically has done this. He has done it not by talk in the lobby, but by his solemn answer to the notice of contest, which is a part of the pleadings in this case. Mr. Chalmers had a right to serve notice of contest; nobody questions that; and Mr. Manning, knowing the effect of what he does, solemnly makes this admission which I contend impeaches his prima facie case.

Now, I hope nobody will plead the baby act. I did hear it intimated by my friend from New York that in a celebrated case, where a man wanted to plead guilty upon a charge of murder, the judge declined to receive the plea; but my friend from New York was obliged to defend the conduct of the judge on the ground that he regarded the party arraigned as insane and not competent to understand the character of the accusation against him. Does anybody charge anything of that kind on the part of Mr. Manning? Nothing criminal is charged upon him. As my associate on the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, says, it is a simple, clean admission of fact. When a man confesses that certain facts are so, why should we not believe him?

A few words in conclusion. What this House may determine upon in this case I do not know. Personally I do not care a baubee (my friend from Kentucky knows what a baubee is) how it may be decided. As a mere partisan I might be glad, of course, to have gentlemen on the other side make mistakes, as you like to have us make mistakes. From a partisan standpoint we would be glad, of course, to have you pile up mistakes "Pelion upon Ossa." But while we may not care, the people, your masters and mine, do care. They are getting tired of this class of frauds in election cases. It will not be two weeks—not a week, as a gentleman near me suggests—before the Committee on Elections will have this case under consideration upon its merits. In Heaven's name, then, why not let it go there and be tried upon its merits? As a patriot, not as a partisan, I appeal to gentlemen not to make the blunder of declaring that upon the question as now presented to this House Mr. Manning has a prima facie case. I have done.

I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD].

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WELLBORN. Will the gentleman from Colorado give way for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. BELFORD. If it be agreeable to the House to adjourn now, I have no objection, upon the understanding that I shall occupy the floor when this question next comes up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized as entitled to the floor.

Mr. WELLBORN. I have no authority to speak for anybody else; but if the gentleman yields for the motion, I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] desires to reach some understanding as to the termination of the debate on the report of the Committee on Elections.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Gentlemen in charge of the naval appropriation bill have kindly yielded the floor that this case may be taken up; and in consideration of this, I would be glad if some agreement could be reached as to a fair and reasonable time within which to terminate this discussion. [A pause.] Mr. Speaker, I find that at this time no arrangement can be reached with reference to limitation of debate on this subject.

BOUNDARY BETWEEN INDIAN TERRITORY AND TEXAS.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 14, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating certain information called for in a resolution of the 5th instant concerning the appointment, scope of power, sureties, and disbursements of the Supervising Architect, and transmitting the testimony taken by, and the report of, a committee of the Treasury Department directed to investigate the administration of the Supervising Architect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be printed. The accompanying papers are very voluminous, and the Chair will take the suggestion of Senators on the subject of printing the papers.

Mr. BUTLER. At the proper time I shall move to refer the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds or some appropriate committee, with a resolution which I shall in the mean time prepare.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Would the Senator like to have the communication laid on the table?

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the order already made is that the letter shall be printed. I do not like to ask for the printing of the voluminous testimony for fear it might be too expensive.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter can be ordered to be printed and referred to the committee with the testimony, and if they think it desirable to print the testimony they can report an order to that effect.

Mr. BUTLER. I think that is the proper course to take.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, submitting a report from Capt. Thomas H. Handbury of the result of an examination and survey of White River, Arkansas, near Duvall's Bluff, with the view of removing obstructions from the channel, made to comply with the requirements of the river and harbor act of August 2, 1882; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, asking that his recommendation of an appropriation of $14,100 for cattle, &c., for certain Sioux Indians, as compensation for ponies taken from them, transmitted to Congress February 17, 1883, be increased to $28,200; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of Maj. L. L. Livingston, praying for legislation to provide for the correction of his military record so as to entitle him to promotion to the grade of lieutenant-colonel first before Maj. R. N. Scott; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have the honor to present a petition, representing a very large number of citizens of Connecticut, setting forth "that only that Indian policy is just, and therefore wise, which has for its ultimate aim citizenship for Indians, through the abolition of the reservation system, by granting to all Indians not now under the Indian government of the Indian Territory lands in severalty, with the same titles, law protection, property rights, common-school education, and religious liberty enjoyed by other races among us."

This paper deserves something more than the honorable burial of an ordinary presentation. It is signed by his excellency the governor of Connecticut, by the lieutenant-governor and other State officers, and more than a hundred other prominent citizens. Among them are the faculty of the Theological Seminary at Hartford, the president and faculty of Wesleyan University at Middletown, the presidents and cashiers or treasurers of eleven large banking and other financial institutions, and a number of eminent clergymen and gentlemen of other learned professions. Seventeen clergymen of various denominations signed it, certifying that the petition has been read to their several congregations and by them approved.

I have no doubt that the statement represents the general sentiment and desire of the thoughtful and intelligent people of Connecticut. I heartily concur with them, and shall endeavor to vote accordingly. I move that the paper be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT presented the memorial of more than one hundred ex-Union soldiers, citizens of Meriden, Conn., remonstrating against the passage of the pending bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SEWELL. I present three petitions, numerously signed by citizens of New Jersey, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of certain parts of the coast of that State. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL presented a petition of the Sons of Temperance of New Jersey, officially signed, representing 1,504 members, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. HARRISON. I present resolutions of Covington Post, No. 4, Grand Army of the Republic, asking that certain relief measures be passed. The resolutions are not formally addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives, but at the conclusion there is an evident intention that they should be so presented. I therefore ask unanimous consent that they may be received.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the resolutions will be received and referred.

Mr. HARRISON. I should think they might be referred to the Committee on Pensions, although they relate to matters that might go to several committees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of the Temple of Honor of Rhode Island, officially signed, representing 600 members, asking for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. CONGER. I present a memorial of the managers of the Industrial Home School of the District of Columbia, in regard to the care and control of infant wards of the school and legal guardianship of the same, which I ask may be printed and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I present also the report of the board of managers of the industrial school, which I move may be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, to accompany a bill which I shall present at the proper time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks that the memorial presented by him be printed. If there be no objection the order will be entered, and, with the accompanying paper, the memorial will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLAIR. I present a petition of the Good Templars of Montana Territory, officially signed, a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Dakota, officially signed, and a petition of the Good Templars of the District of Columbia, officially signed, representing 1,200 members, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquors for drinking purposes throughout the country. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Madison, Wisconsin, officially signed, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of the Grand Division Sons of Temperance of Pennsylvania, officially signed, representing 7,563 members, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for drinking purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented the petition of Henry McKinney and others, citizens of Susquehanna County, Pennsylvania, praying that $20,000,000 be appropriated for common schools, to be divided among the States and Territories according to illiteracy therein, and that this and all other appropriations made by this Congress be paid by an issue of United States notes; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of Alfred Toles Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Pennsylvania, praying that copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD be supplied to all Grand Army Posts; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also presented a memorial of the Pennsylvania State Association of ex-Union prisoners of the late war, in favor of pensions for Union soldiers who were prisoners of war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I present three petitions: one from citizens of Livingston, Territory of Montana, and two from citizens of Clark's Fork mining district, in the Territory of Montana, praying that the right of way be granted to the Cinnabar and Clark's Fork Railroad Company through the National Yellowstone Park. I move the reference of the petitions to the Committee on Railroads, to which a bill relating to the same subject has been referred.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to suggest that the whole matter of the police control and regulation of the Yellowstone Park has been under consideration in the Committee on Territories. A bill has been referred to that committee whose provisions would relate precisely to this sort of thing; and if the Senator is willing I suggest that the petitions ought to go to the Committee on Territories. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has been giving very careful attention, as a subcommittee, to all matters connected with the use of the park, and it would simply lead to divided counsels if that matter is to be considered in two committees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no power under the rules of the Senate to decide to what committee the petitions ought to go, and he must therefore put the question first on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to refer the petitions to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I have moved to refer the petitions to the Committee on Railroads because the bill was referred there some days ago. I suppose the subject being in their custody, until that committee act or ask some change of reference on the subject, I should not be at liberty to agree to another reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to refer the petitions to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. HARRISON. I will not interpose. If the bill is already there, it would not be of any avail to send these petitions elsewhere.

Mr. SEWELL. I will state for the information of the Senator from Indiana that the bill is already in the Committee on Railroads and under consideration, and I think it is proper that the bill granting a charter to a railroad company should remain in the hands of that committee.

Mr. CONGER. The bill which was referred to the Committee on Railroads I understand is a bill for constructing whatever railroad might be authorized, if any, in the National Park. The bill has reference to the construction of an accommodation railroad in the National Park, I understand.

Mr. MCMILLAN. As I understand the matter (and I am not very familiar with it) this application is to grant a right of way to this railroad company through a portion of the park. It is in the interest of certain mining regions.

Mr. CULLOM. Upon my hearing of the reading of the title of the bill presented by the Senator from Minnesota I think it is identically the same bill that is now before the Committee on Railroads, and has been under consideration, and is not yet disposed of. I make this remark in view of the fact that the Senator from Michigan was making a statement as to his understanding of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. The reason is still stronger; I supposed it was a bill for a local railroad. If it is for a right of way through the National Park for a general railroad, that by all the precedents should go to the committee having charge of that subject. The Committee on Territories have had charge of all matters relating to the park, just as we refer to the Committee on Indian Affairs any bill proposing a right of way through Indian Territory. The proper committee having charge and control of all matters relating to the park should have control, I think, of any question of granting the right of way to a general railroad company through it. I supposed this was a railroad within the park, but if it is a provision for a right of way for a general railroad through it, it certainly should go to the Committee on Territories, and the reference of the bill itself was contrary to the general custom. All bills, the Chair will remember, granting rights of way through Indian territory have been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and all bills granting rights of way through military reservations have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and the analogy would hold good in this case.

Mr. SEWELL. I simply wish to make a correction. The Senator from Michigan makes the statement that all such bills are referred to certain committees. That is not borne out by the fact. All the bills that we had under consideration last year to grant charters to railroad companies through the Indian Territory went to the Railroad Committee, and such has been the case generally.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], as well as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER], misunderstands the action which has taken place this morning. I presented three petitions in favor of a right of way through the National Park for the railroad which I have mentioned. The bill granting the right of way through the park was presented in the Senate several days ago and was referred to the Committee on Railroads, and is in their possession for their action. They have not yet made any report upon it. These petitions being upon the same subject, I supposed they would of course go to the committee having charge of the bill, and therefore the motion I made was to refer them to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Minnesota that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. BECK. Would it be in order to have the petition read again? There was a good deal of confusion while it was being read and I did not hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petitions were not read. The contents were stated to be in favor of the construction of a railway in the Yellowstone Park.

Mr. VEST. May I inquire of the Chair to what committee the bill on that subject was referred?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the bill was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The petitions ask Congress to grant a right of way through the park to the railroad company which is named in the bill.

Mr. VEST. I do not know that it does any good to mention it now, but the bill ought to have gone to the Committee on Territories. The question of the Yellowstone Park has been under consideration by that committee since the commencement of the session. It really ought to have gone to the Committee on Territories originally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to refer the petitions to the Committee on Railroads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the memorial of William Baker, of Toledo, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. 559) to quiet the title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I present a petition and the proceedings of a public meeting of citizens of Crystal River, Hernando County, Florida, praying for the improvement of the harbor at Crystal River, Florida, of which Mr. James L. Miller was chairman and Mr. N. Barco secretary, and a committee composed of T. S. Winn, esq., chairman, G. T. Willis, John M. Coleman, John King, Dr. W. A. Shands, J. W. Atkinson, Rev. J. B. Harolson, O. P. Keller, S. J. Pardoe, G. W. Carter, and James Williams.

The petition states that Crystal River is eligibly located on the Gulf coast of Florida as a port of refuge for vessels in distress, that it has a depth of fifteen or twenty feet of water, and with some improvement by the Government may be made a place of commercial importance. In this connection I ask the consideration of the Committee on Commerce to the importance of adequate appropriations for the harbors on the coast of Florida, both on the Gulf and Atlantic coast.

The coast line of Florida on the Gulf and Atlantic extends for more than 1,400 miles, and along its entire extent a vast commerce is constantly passing. The harbors of both the Atlantic and Gulf are of importance to the whole country.

In addition to this, a considerable commerce in sponge, fish, and corals, besides the fruits and products of the country, is rapidly growing up.

I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND presented a petition of the grand jury of the February term of the United States district court for the western district of Arkansas, praying that Congress provide for the building of a courthouse at Fort Smith, Ark.; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, praying for the refunding of the money contributed by that body and others toward the purchase, in 1860, of the old post-office site on Nassau street, New York, afterward abandoned and sold by the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of New York, officially signed, representing 7,000 members, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Northville, N. Y., remonstrating against the passage of the bill (H. R. 3617) changing the time or limit of United States patents from seventeen to five years; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. PLUMB. I present the petition of John S. Kirkpatrick, late a private of Company K, First Colorado Volunteers, who states at length and in a somewhat pathetic way the difficulty that he has had in making his proofs at the Pension Office and his final failure to make such proofs, and asking that such legislation be had as will enable him and persons similarly situated, who by reason of lapse of time are not able to make the statements required by law, to obtain pensions to which they believe they are entitled. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of the State Temperance Union of Kansas, officially signed, representing 6,000 members, and a petition of the National Temperance Society of New York, officially signed, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for drinking purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Albuquerque, N. Mex., praying for an appropriation for education in the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of certain soldiers living in the Indian Territory, praying for the passage of an act removing the charge of desertion from the class of soldiers named therein; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BECK presented the petition of Jefferson Fields, of Sanford, Ky., late private Company C, Third Regiment Illinois Volunteers, praying to be granted a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MANDERSON presented a petition of late officers of the volunteer army, praying for the passage of the bills now pending to fix the rate of pension of commissioned officers at one-half the pay of the rank held by such officers at the time the disability was received; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON. I present a memorial and resolutions adopted by Typographical Union No. 68, of the city of Keokuk, State of Iowa, in favor of such legislation as will prevent the importation of pauper laborers under contract to work for less than fair remuneration to American workingmen. The memorial is addressed to the Senators and Representatives from the State, but is evidently intended for consideration by the Senate. I therefore present it, and ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be received, if there there be no objection, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BOWEN presented a petition of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of Colorado, officially signed, representing 2,200 members, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of members of the Wool-Growers' Association of Las Animas County, Colorado, praying for the restoration of the duty on wool; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of the Phil. Kearny Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Laclede, Mo., and a petition of ex-Union soldiers of Xenia, Ohio, praying for general legislation favorable to the ex-Union soldiers; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of soldiers of the late war, citizens of Illinois, praying that land-warrants for one hundred and sixty acres and pensions of $8 a month be granted to ex-Union soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of John A. Platter Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Lawrenceburg, Ind., praying for the passage of a bill granting one hundred and sixty acres of land, without requirement of settlement, to every officer, soldier, and sailor who served in the Union Army during the late war and were honorably discharged and to the widows and minors of those who died without receiving it; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of members of the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Illinois, remonstrating against the passage of the bill abolishing pension agencies; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of the pensioners of the pension district of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against the abolition of pension agencies; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of Grand Army Post, No. 156, of Ottawa, Ill., praying for the opening up to settlement of the Sioux reservation; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. LOGAN. I also present, at the request of the parties, a petition of citizens of Chicago, Ill., praying for a general law on the subject of divorce. I do not know what we have to do with the subject. Still I present the petition, and move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL. I report from the Committee on Finance favorably the bill (H. R. 2555) to change the name of "The National La Fayette and Bank of Commerce" to that of "The National La Fayette Bank;" and also favorably the bill (S. 1314) to change the name of the James Sweet National Bank, of Nebraska City, Nebr. I will ask for the present consideration of these bills, because it will take less time now than at any other, and because the parties in interest desire early action in order that they may proceed with the organization of the two banks. The bills are unanimously reported by the committee and approved by the Comptroller of the Currency.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first bill reported will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 2555) to change the name of "The National La Fayette and Bank of Commerce" to that of "The National La Fayette Bank."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection that the bill be now considered?

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar. The other bill reported by the Senator from Vermont will be placed on the Calendar also.

Mr. MILLER, of California, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 76) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1508) to authorize the Postmaster-General to lease premises for use of post-offices of the first, second, and third classes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SAWYER. I am instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate this morning to take up the bill (H. R. 1482) making all public roads and highways post-routes. It is a short bill, of only four lines.

Mr. MORGAN. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. SAWYER. If we do not get the bill passed now we shall have to pass a general post-route bill, as heretofore; and it is very short, only four lines.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, but after 1 o'clock it will be in order for the Senator from Wisconsin to move to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. That will be right. I shall have no objection to it then, but I have now.

Mr. PLATT. I am instructed by the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3925) to regulate practice in patent suits, to report it without amendment. It relates to the remedy to be pursued against persons who have purchased patented articles in good faith for their own use.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1122) for the relief of M. H. Collins, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. COKE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 51) to authorize the construction of a bridge for the transportation of street-cars, wagons, and other vehicles, horses and other animals, and pedestrians over the Rio Grande River between the cities of Eagle Pass, Tex., and Piedras Negras, Mexico, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 664) to authorize the construction of a bridge for the transportation of street-cars and other vehicles, &c., over the Rio Grande River between the cities of Laredo, Tex., and Nueva Laredo, Mexico, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of John F. Ballier, praying for an increase of his pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. HARRISON. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred two petitions, one of them very numerously signed, at least bearing at the foot of it very numerous printed signatures, and the other a manuscript petition from paymasters of the United States Army, asking the passage of a law to give them additional compensation for services rendered by them during the war, to submit a report. The committee have considered these petitions, and I submit a written report, which is the unanimous expression of the committee, adverse to the prayer of the petitioners. We could see no reason why the compensation, which may have been inadequate judged by a commercial standard, but which was the fixed compensation of offices which were sought by these persons, should be increased, especially in view of the fact that much more dangerous and severe and exhaustive services were rendered at much smaller compensation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petitions will be announced.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A petition of paymasters, praying for additional compensation for their services as such paymasters during the war of the rebellion;" and "the petition of H. A. Tenney and Morgan L. Martin, of Wisconsin, late paymasters of the United States volunteer army of the rebellion, praying for additional compensation."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Military Affairs will be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions.

Mr. CONGER. Will the report be printed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All reports are printed under the rule, if they be in writing, without any special order.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 665) for the relief of Patrick Cook; and

A bill (S. 349) for payment to Daniel Donovan for additional labor and services rendered the District of Columbia.

Mr. MCPHERSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 427) for the relief of Thomas G. Corbin, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

REGENTS OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 58) filling an existing vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, to report it without amendment. As that board is about to meet, and it is proper the matter should be disposed of, I will ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution. It will take but a moment.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It provides that the existing vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class "other than members of Congress," shall be filled by the reappointment of Noah Porter, of Connecticut, whose term of service has expired.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONGER introduced a bill (S. 1519) to regulate the powers and duties of the board of trustees of the Industrial Home School of the District of Columbia in respect to infant wards and scholars, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONGER. The memorial and papers which I presented this morning in their order will be sent to the committee with the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They were referred this morning.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 1532) granting a pension to Bridget Curtin; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VOORHEES (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1533) to define and supplement an act re-establishing the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award, approved June 5, 1882; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PENDLETON introduced a bill (S. 1540) for the relief of Thomas Worthington; which was read twice by its title, and, together with the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Claims.

SALARIES OF DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. SAWYER. Is it in order now to ask unanimous consent to consider the bill making all public roads and highways post-routes?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was not reported to-day?

Mr. SAWYER. No; it was reported a week or two ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that under Rule VII, it being now 1 o'clock, the Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill he has named.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator, before proceeding to that, yield to me for a matter connected with morning business?

Mr. SAWYER. I will give way to allow further formal business to be presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin withdraws the motion for the time being.

Mr. HARRISON. It will be, I think, in the recollection of most Senators that a few days ago, when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] reported from the Judiciary Committee the bill (S. 1476) fixing the salaries of the district judges of the United States, I interrogated him as to whether the bill included in its provisions the United States district judge for Indiana. The response was that it did, and at the rate of $5,000. Upon an examination of the bill I find that the district judge for our State is not mentioned, either in the class of $5,000 or $4,000; the salary is left as at present. There was evidently some mistake in reporting the bill. I have talked with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], of the Judiciary Committee, and have his consent to make the motion which I shall now make in his absence, which is that the bill be recommitted to the Judiciary Committee with a view of correcting this error and any other that may be in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the bill (S. 1476) fixing the salaries of the district judges of the United States, reported on the 11th instant from the Committee on the Judiciary, be recommitted to that committee. If there be no objection that order will be entered. It is entered.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask for the following order:

Ordered, That all papers now on file with the Secretary of the Senate pertaining to a claim of Abraham P. Drost be withdrawn and returned to him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be entered subject to the rule, if there be no objection.

Mr. LOGAN. I think an adverse report was made, but I wish to state that the papers the claimant desires are papers showing that he was in the service, his discharge, &c., which were filed as part of the evidence. I ask to have the rule extended so as to allow him to withdraw those papers, which are very necessary to him, and have no connection whatever with the claim he made except as evidence to show that he had been a soldier.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule allows papers to be withdrawn on leaving copies in cases of adverse reports.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; I will ask that the order be so entered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be entered subject to the rule.

On motion of Mr. MAXEY it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of William W. Burns be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair finds that a resolution went over from yesterday. The resolution of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] which was objected to yesterday will be laid before the Senate. It will be reported.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. VOORHEES was read, as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that the Northern Pacific Railroad Company has selected, in lieu of lands claimed to have been lost to said company within the "granted limits" established by the act of July 2, 1864 (13 Statutes, 365), lands within the ten-mile indemnity limits, circumscribed by said act, which said lands so selected were occupied by homestead and pre-emption settlers at the time the line of said road was definitely fixed, namely, October 4, 1880, and also at the date of such selections; and

Whereas it is alleged that the withdrawal from sale and settlement of the odd-numbered sections within said indemnity limits, on the 4th day of October, 1880, by the Secretary of the Interior, was unwarranted by the act of July 2, 1864, or by any of the acts or resolutions amendatory thereof, and that said odd-numbered sections were subject to entry under the public-land laws of the United States until the date of actual selection by said corporation: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to withhold his approval of the selections made within the indemnity limits as aforesaid, and to suspend all action thereon until Congress shall determine the questions involved in the claims of settlers upon the lands so selected by said corporation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. Is that a joint or a Senate resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a Senate resolution.

Mr. VOORHEES. I can explain it in a moment.

Mr. INGALLS. Before the Senator proceeds to speak on the merits of the resolution I suggest whether it is competent for the Senate alone to direct the performance of any duty or the omission to perform any duty in specific terms. I suppose that may be done by Congress; but I should doubt the power of the Senate alone unaided to take such action.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am under the impression that the precedents support this resolution, though upon that question I am not at this time fully advised, because I did not suppose the point would be raised.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no doubt the Secretary of the Interior would comply with such a request, if that were made.

Mr. VOORHEES. If the Senator's point is as between the word "directed" and "requested," I would as soon use the word "requested."

Mr. INGALLS. I think it would be better.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will modify the resolution in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana modifies the resolution by changing the word "directed" to the word "requested."

Mr. VOORHEES. So that it shall read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to withhold his approval, &c.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Indiana will pardon me if I make another suggestion. The preamble declares that it is alleged that certain unlawful action has been taken by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and the resolution proceeds to take it for granted that it has been done. The words "if such were made" in the resolution would put it on proper ground.

Mr. VOORHEES. Where would that amendment come in?

Mr. HAWLEY. In the third line of the resolution, after the word "aforesaid," insert "if any such were made."

Mr. VOORHEES. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana further modifies his resolution by inserting after the word "aforesaid" the words "if any such were made."

Mr. MORGAN. It will be a long time before Congress acts, and the resolution may suspend action for a great while.

Mr. VOORHEES. Allow me to explain.

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. VOORHEES. I thought if the resolution would pass without explanation, well and good; but if not, I can make an explanation in a moment.

A few days ago I introduced a bill on this subject, carefully prepared, and sent it to the Committee on Public Lands. This does not postpone the question at all. The matter is before the Senate, before one or two committees now, and can be investigated at once. This is only to suspend action during the investigation of the bill, providing that the Secretary shall withhold further action. That is all. If it is necessary to enter into an explanation of the merits of this matter, I will do so. There is a bill, as I said, raising the whole question before the Committee on Public Lands. This is simply a request that the Secretary of the Interior shall withhold action until that matter is investigated and the rights of the parties determined.

Mr. MORGAN. A number of bills are pending before the Committee on Public Lands, to which they have devoted most diligent attention, sometimes sitting up to as late as 2 o'clock in the morning to hear arguments from counsel on both sides, and that committee are working with a great deal of earnestness to come to conclusions which they expect to report to the Senate very soon. In the mean time the Government is going on with its regular functions, discharging its proper duties under the laws requiring it to determine upon the rights of settlers on the public lands, whether upon the even or the odd sections, whatever their rights may be; and I do not feel disposed to interrupt the Government in that particular, because I believe, I hope at least, that whenever we shall come to a conclusion upon any measure affecting the grants of public lands to railroads heretofore made, we are not going to reach back with a rude, violent hand and tear up or cut up those rights of property that have lawfully supervened upon our own action and by our own invitation in favor of anybody, railroad company, settler, or what not. I for one would not be willing to undertake to correct whatever of evil there may be in the legislation of Congress heretofore by a visitation of more severe and unjust wrong upon persons who may have dealt in good faith and upon the invitation of the Government with these railroad companies. So I do not think it is wise or proper for us at this time to anticipate any line of action that Congress may be disposed to take in the future, and prevent persons who may have the right to acquire interests in these railroad lands from going on under the laws of the country to acquire them just as if no legislation was pending.

Ever since I have been in this body measures have been coming forward from session to session threatening the disruption of the rights which railroad companies and others have acquired under the Congressional land grants, and we might just as well have stopped the consideration of this question six years ago as to stop it now. If we invite the Secretary of the Interior to take no further action under the laws existing because we are contemplating some change in the laws, I do not know when we should be able to relieve him from that injunction that we put on him by this resolution and allow the Government to go on in the discharge of its regular and lawful duties in respect to the public lands.

There is, I think, no case for a resolution of this kind, for the officers of that Department having control of the public lands have been very conservative and very careful in administering the rights that fall within their jurisdiction, and I have heard at least of no serious cases of evil that have arisen, and I really do not apprehend any danger in the future which makes it necessary that we should apply an extraordinary remedy as is proposed in this resolution.

I am opposed to the resolution, because I think that it interrupts the orderly conduct of the Government and does not put a period to the time when the resolution shall cease to have its effect, and if we were to adopt it in the terms in which it is offered we should merely chain the Government to a line of policy of inaction while we should go on to speculate about what we might be able to do in the way of legislation for the relief of the persons that we suppose deserve relief. I think the resolution ought not to pass.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama misapprehends the question before the Senate. It is simply this: By the act of 1864 authorizing the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad, as every Senator knows, the alternate sections forty miles on each side were granted to the road to enable the company to construct it. In that same act it was provided that where persons had made settlement by pre-emption or otherwise within the granted limits there should be an indemnity given of ten miles additional width on each side in which the company was allowed to make selections in lieu of lands taken up in this way. These are called in the parlance of the railroad the "lieu lands," lands in lieu of others. Within this indemnity limit of ten miles in Eastern Washington Territory a large number of actual settlers had made their homes and built houses and made permanent improvements before the line of the road was definitely fixed, so that they could not tell whether they were within the indemnity limits or not; and when the road was definitely located this limit affected these settlers.

The bill which I have introduced is to secure the actual settlers who made their homes there, built their houses, made their improvements, against having those places selected by the railroad company as "lieu lands," to protect them from the railroad reaching out and going into a farming community, taking a man's farm which has been made worth $10 an acre, we will say, by his labor, and which he had located before the line of the road itself was located. The bill that has been introduced and is before the Committee on Public Lands is to protect them in the right to purchase that land from the Government at Government price. It does not seem to me to be a very difficult question, and with the great skill and legal ability of the Senator from Alabama, he being a member of the committee himself, I think that question might be looked into with reasonable celerity.

Again, this is a question between these settlers and the rights of the railroad company to select their homes as railroad lands. I have already introduced the bill, and I want the Department simply to suspend all action until that bill can be considered.

I have here a petition which I expected to present this morning, but it passed through my hands and I will present it to-morrow morning, signed by ten or eleven hundred actual settlers, petitioning Congress to pass this bill to give them a right to get title to land of which they are actually holders, as against the alleged right of the railroad company to select their homes as railroad lands inside of the ten-mile indemnity limit.

Now, I say to the Senator from Alabama, and I say to all Senators, that at this long distance looking out yonder the question may look little to him, but it looks awfully big to a man who has his family there and built his house there; and there is no question that could come before the Senate which has higher merits than the one that is now being considered.

I did not expect to talk about it this morning and did not desire to do so, but if the Senate refuse to request the proper Department of the Government to suspend action until proper and legitimate inquiry can be made as to the rights of actual settlers out there on that frontier, it will be a very strange proceeding indeed.

I enter upon this in no spirit of hostility against the railroad company, none whatever. I enter upon it with no desire to clog their rights or give them more trouble than they ought to have; but I do enter upon it to say that they have no right to select as "lieu lands" homes that were made before the indemnity limit was fixed, before they located their road, before they had any right there at all. The settlers' right is higher than theirs; and that is the legislation which I propose, and during the time it is going on I want the Department to hold still.

Mr. BAYARD. The case stated by the Senator from Indiana is undoubtedly a very strong one and appeals very strongly to every man's sense of justice to do what may be done for the purpose of preventing a wrong so wholesale as the one described by him; but there is something certainly unusual in adopting the machinery of a resolution, not reported by a committee upon ascertained facts, but which is to operate summarily as an injunction to prevent the approval of selections and all action by the Secretary of the Interior until what?

Until Congress shall determine the questions involved in the claims of settlers upon the lands so selected by said corporation.

It seems to me that if the Senator would modify his resolution and direct the Secretary of the Interior immediately to inform the Senate whether these allegations are true, it would be well enough; but it would be an unheard-of thing for an officer of the Government to go on and execute such a law as this in the face of these facts. If the resolution be passed in the form I suggest, then Congress being possessed of the information which the Secretary would return to them can pass promptly a measure of relief, in which I will heartily join the Senator when it shall be brought in. But it seems to me that we may be dealing with rights created by law in a very summary way by thus enjoining the action of the Secretary of the Interior when we are acting simply upon allegations which may or may not be well founded. I think the Senator will attain the object he desires by an amendment to his resolution making it read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested forthwith to inform the Senate whether the above recited allegations are true.

If such a resolution as that is passed, I have not the slightest idea that any step will be taken by the Secretary pending the investigation by Congress. It might be that the parties, whoever they may be, who are asking his action are acting under color of law, and I do not think we ought to do what at best would be the issuance of an injunction upon an officer of the Government to arrest his action under law.

I suggest that to my friend because I consider that all these questions ought to be carefully guarded, and I know of no precedent which would justify us in in this way instructing him to suspend action upon the mere allegation of facts which may or may not be correctly stated. I think if my friend will consider it he will see that the object will be reached in the mode I suggest, and it will be quite sufficient to arrest really any action.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I have no idea or information that the Secretary of the Interior desires to act hastily or improperly in connection with this matter. On the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware I will ask that this resolution go over until to-morrow morning if it will not lose its right to be called up then. How will that be, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Chair would state to the Senator from Indiana that by unanimous consent the resolution may lie upon the table subject to be laid before the Senate to-morrow, but unless there is unanimous consent the President pro tempore of the Senate holds that it goes to the Calendar and takes its place there.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then I ask that unanimous consent, and I think in the mean time I will modify the resolution so as to suit all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the resolution lying on the table until to-morrow morning subject to be laid before the Senate at that time?

Mr. GARLAND. Before that order is taken I wish to make a suggestion. I would suggest to the Senator from Indiana that the resolution as it stands be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. That is the proper disposition of it, in my judgment. The subject-matter is before the Committee on Public Lands, as was intimated by the Senator from Alabama. I know in the history of the legislation of the Senate that when matters are pending before a committee, if the committee address to the particular Department a request to "hold up," as the saying is, the Department will do so. I recollect in the investigation of a celebrated land case when I was on the Land Committee the committee requested the Secretary of the Interior to suspend further action, as the matter was pending before them, and he did so. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana to let his resolution be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; and with the whole matter before them they can correspond with the Department and the Department will take the proper action, and not have us directing him what to do. If it is not objectionable to the Senator from Indiana, I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. VOORHEES. I shall make no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

FENCING OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. INGALLS. I offer a resolution that I ask may be now considered.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to report to the Senate any information now filed in his Department relative to unauthorized fencing of the public lands of the United States for grazing purposes.

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest to my colleague while the question is up why not extend it to other purposes? Why not let us have all the information?

Mr. INGALLS. Strike out "for grazing purposes."

Mr. PLUMB. There is a bill now before the Committee on Public Lands dealing with that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be modified. Will the Senator from Kansas state the modification?

Mr. INGALLS. Strike out the last three words, "for grazing purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be so modified.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PUBLIC ROADS POST-ROUTES.

Mr. SAWYER. I move to take up House bill 1482, and put it upon its passage.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1482) making all public roads and highways post-routes. It declares all public roads and highways, kept up and maintained as such, to be post-routes; and provides that the Postmaster-General may establish postal service upon the same whenever in his judgment the public welfare requires it.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend by inserting in the proper place "while thus maintained."

Mr. SAWYER. It reads so now, as I think the gentleman will see if he will hear the bill read again.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I think there should be something requiring that, while thus kept up, the roads shall be post-roads. Declaring them post-roads would make them post-roads forever.

Mr. SAWYER. I think the Senator is mistaken in his construction. We looked that over in committee very carefully.

Mr. CONGER. If the committee are satisfied that this will only apply while the roads are kept up as such, I shall not press the amendment.

Mr. SAWYER. That was the idea of the committee.

Mr. HILL. The introduction of one word "while" would answer the objection; so as to read "while kept up and maintained."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL]? The Chair hears none; and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. What would be the effect on the postal service upon a road after it had been vacated by State authority? Are we not likely to get our postal service into something of confusion by making it dependent on the action of the local authorities?

Another suggestion, Mr. President. This simply takes out of the hands of Congress all control of the postal service of the United States except so far as relates to the carriage on railroads. The Postmaster-General having before him that ganglion of tracts called township roads, county roads, State roads, national roads, may at his own sweet will put on daily service, weekly service, tri-weekly service, semi-monthly or monthly or any other service he pleases, obligating the Government to pay for it, and Congress will know nothing about it until after the contracts have been made and they shall be reported to Congress with a polite request to have the necessary money appropriated to pay obligations already incurred.

While I can think of a great many cases where this power would be justifiable, it seems to me it is wise to consider that heretofore Congress has never given to the Postmaster-General power to put on temporary service, that is, service over a route not established by law, for a longer period than twelve months, and I think now the limit is six months by law. For a long time there was no provision whatever for service of that kind. I only speak of that to show how cautiously and conservatively Congress has heretofore guarded the power of the establishment of postal service.

Mr. SAWYER. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if he has ever known a case where a member or a Senator asked to have a road put in as a post-road where it was not done? This is to save us from passing a large post-route bill every year.

Mr. PLUMB. There is no doubt our methods of legislation are cumbrous, but that is one of the inevitable accompaniments of republican government anyhow; and even if we do legislate as a matter of course, that is to say, if we do put on post-routes simply at the request of anybody who chooses to offer an amendment to that effect, that is a better guard than it is to throw open the entire road system of the United States to the Postmaster-General with a continual discretion to him that he shall wherever he sees fit put on service not limited to daily or weekly or tri-weekly, but to make it just as much and as often as he pleases.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator will pardon me, I think the Postmaster-General practically does that now. We pass a post-route bill every session embracing a number of post-routes, and the Postmaster-General puts postal service on or not as he sees fit. He puts weekly service or tri-weekly service or daily service on what are known as the star routes, or no service at all, just as he sees proper. It seems to me he has just as much power now for all practical purposes as he would have under the operation of this bill.

Mr. PLUMB. He can not put service on a route that is not established by law.

Mr. BUTLER. Of course he can not, but he does put it or not on all that are established by law, as he chooses.

Mr. PLUMB. It is true he does; but if we open to him not only the number of routes named in the statute, but all the other traveled roads in the United States, and say to him he has that power, how do we know he will not exercise it improvidently? It is simply abdicating the whole control of the postal service in favor of the Postmaster-General. That is all it is.

Mr. HILL. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if he is not aware that there are thousands of post-routes now established in the United States on which no service has been ever put, so that the mere fact of establishing more routes will not in the slightest degree increase the amount of service which shall be put on the routes?

Mr. PLUMB. If that is true it is a confession that this bill is not necessary; and inasmuch as we have got along reasonably well under the old system, why not maintain it?

Mr. HILL. It has been the custom in Congress for many years at every session to pass a post-route bill. It involves a great deal of labor and a great deal of expense, and it has appeared to the committee to be an entirely unnecessary labor. We put upon those bills in every case every route that is offered, no matter from what source it comes; we see that the route is put on the bill, and never of my knowledge has there been an objection made to any route being put upon one of those bills. I can see no harm that can possibly result from the passage of this bill and a great deal of good.

Mr. HALE. I suppose that what the Senator from Colorado has alluded to is precisely the object of this bill. Every year there is an annual post-route bill and every Senator who wants a route put on in his State and every Representative in the other branch who wants a route put on in his district puts it on; nobody ever objects; it goes into the post-route bill; it goes through without an objection; and the Postmaster-General puts as much service as he chooses, after investigation, on those routes.

Mr. BUTLER. And as little as he chooses.

Mr. HALE. And as little as he chooses. The operation practically is that if there is a new route to be established it frequently has to wait a year or a session of Congress before it can be got into the post-route bill, but it always goes in in time, nobody objecting. I take it the principle of this bill is to take away the necessity for that delay, and instead of doing it piecemeal as we always do nobody objecting, to give general authority to the Postmaster-General to put on service wherever he deems it essential without waiting for this annual post-route bill. It seems to me that it is a good measure and that it will save something by avoiding the passage of the annual bill which is practically useless.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to strike out the last clause of the bill. Let the Secretary read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out:

And the Postmaster-General may establish postal service upon the same whenever in his judgment the public welfare requires it.

Mr. INGALLS. Now let the bill be read as it will stand if amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That all public roads and highways, while kept up and maintained as such, are hereby declared to be post-routes.

Mr. INGALLS. That leaves the bill in accordance with the established system in the Revised Statutes. Section 3964 provides:

The following are established post-roads:
All the waters of the United States, during the time the mail is carried thereon.
All railroads or parts of railroads which are now or hereafter may be in operation.
All canals, during the time the mail is carried thereon.
All plank-roads during the time the mail is carried thereon.
The road on which the mail is carried to supply any court-house which may be without a mail, and the road on which the mail is carried under contract made by the Postmaster-General for extending the line of posts to supply mails to post-offices not on any established route, during the time such mail is carried thereon.
All letter-carrier routes established in any city or town for the collection and delivery of mail matters.

Section 3965 provides:

The Postmaster-General shall provide for carrying the mail on all post-roads established by law, as often as he, having due regard to productiveness and other circumstances, may think proper.

Mr. SAWYER. I can see no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. That makes the bill symmetrical with the other portions of the postal service.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, for several years after I came into the Senate I held the same opinion just expressed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], that this was conferring too much power on the Postmaster-General; but after about nine years' service upon the Post-Office Committee, and knowing the fact that by law every navigable stream in the United States, every canal, every plank-road, every railroad, was a postal-road, and the great highways across the ocean post-roads, I could see no reason so far as power was concerned for refusing to extend this power already granted to other established roads, public roads and highways kept up and maintained as such.

By section 3964 of the United States Revised Statutes the following are established post-roads:

1. All the waters of the United States, during the time the mail is carried thereon.
2. All railroads or parts of railroads which are now or hereafter may be in operation.
3. All canals, during the time the mail is carried thereon.
4. All plank-roads during the time the mail is carried thereon.
5. The road on which the mail is carried to supply any court-house which may be without a mail.
6. The road on which the mail is carried under contract made by the Postmaster-General for extending the line of posts to supply mails to post-offices not on any established routes, during the time such mail is carried thereon.
7. All letter-carrier routes established in any city or town for the collection and delivery of mail matter.

Provision is also made by law for carrying the mails in vessels to and from foreign ports.

It is thus seen that this bill is a mere extension to "all public roads and highways kept up and maintained as such" of the power already exercised by Congress on other roads, and it is not a grant of new power. It is simply an extension of the power already exercised so as to embrace a class of roads in every county and neighborhood in the country, "public highways kept up and maintained as such."

These public highways kept up and maintained as such can be ascertained by the Postmaster-General without difficulty. If Congress has the power to establish as post-roads railroads which are now or hereafter may be in operation, the power as well as policy of this bill is well established by the law as to other highways which I have cited, the wisdom of which is acquiesced in on all hands.

In respect to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], it seems to me that it simply leaves the power where it is already lodged. The Postmaster-General already has power to establish service on any established post-route, and if this bill is passed then his powers as to the service on these highways will be precisely the same as he now has on other highways, railroads, &c., established as post-routes. Congress first establishes the route before service can be put on it, and when Congress establishes the post-route there the Postmaster-General by law now has the power to put the service on or to withdraw service if he believes the demand is not sufficient to justify it. I do not think that striking out this clause, as proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], adds to or diminishes the power the Postmaster-General now has under the law as it now is and from an early period in the history of the country has been; and after a long experience with these huge post-route bills, which take up so much time of the Post-Office Committee, and which include any route that any Senator or Representative asks for the people he represents, I am of the opinion that it will be economy of the time of the Senate and of the business of Congress to pass this bill. Whatever may be thought of the propriety of the legislation in respect to the establishment of railroads, canals, rivers, &c., as mail-routes without designating by name and description, as is required in ordinary public highways, it has been too long acquiesced in to disturb, and the reason for designating by general description the class of roads as described in the bill is just the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CHANGE OF NAME OF BANKS.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President——

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that two bills reported this morning from the Committee on Finance——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] was recognized as entitled to the floor.

Mr. PENDLETON. I rose for the purpose of asking the same thing which I presume the Senator from Vermont desires to ask; that is, to take up House bill 2555, reported from the Committee on Finance this morning, changing the name of a bank, to which I think there is no objection.

Mr. MORRILL. And which has already been read.

Mr. PENDLETON. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] interposed an objection this morning, which he is now prepared to withdraw.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill, but I wish to submit to the Senator from Vermont whether it is not feasible to prepare some general bill confiding to the Secretary of the Treasury the power, under proper restrictions and with the necessary guarantees, to permit these changes to be made. It appears to me that there can be no objection to this, and I would suggest whether it might not be advisable to recommit these bills with instructions to report a general bill that shall allow such action by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MORRILL. I think it is entirely practicable to report such a bill, and I will also say that it seems to me it is practicable to report a bill that should enable the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency to allow of the removal of a bank from one place to another under the restrictions that we have heretofore always reserved in guarding those bills, and I hope at an early day to be able to present a bill for the support of the Senator from Kansas and other members on that subject; but I trust these bills will be allowed to pass this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the two bills mentioned by the Senator from Vermont? The Chair hears no objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2555) to change the name of "The National La Fayette and Bank of Commerce" to that of "The National La Fayette Bank."

Mr. BECK. I hope this bill will pass and the other bill reported this morning; but as we have just done a very wise thing to-day in getting clear of the post-route bills by a general law, I hope the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas will receive consideration, and that he will offer a resolution to-day or to-morrow instructing the Committee on Finance to inquire into the expediency of passing a general law on this subject, so as to avoid the repetition of these bills, which is becoming almost as annoying as the post-route bill with the number of banks we now have.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 1314) to change the name of the James Sweet National Bank of Nebraska City, Nebr., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask unanimous consent to offer the resolution which I send to the desk for present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be directed to consider the expediency of providing by general legislation for the change of name of national banks, and that they report by bill or otherwise at the present session.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

JOHN LEATHERS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first case on the Calendar will now be called.

The bill (S. 253) for the relief of John Leathers was announced as first in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

Mr. DOLPH. I think there are some amendments pending which have not been acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that there are amendments reported by the committee, and they are first in order before any other amendments can be received.

Mr. DOLPH. I had the floor at the time the order of business fixed for 2 o'clock was called yesterday and was about to make some suggestions in answer to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]. I had suddenly come into the Senate Chamber, when I was called upon for some explanation in regard to the bill by the Senator from Kansas yesterday, and I spoke from recollection in regard to the facts of the case. I find upon an examination of the papers that while my remarks of yesterday are generally applicable to this case and explain the merits of the claim, I was mistaken in regard to some of the facts.

There were at the same time the application of Mr. Leathers was made applications made to the President for pardon by nine other persons: S. Flinn, J. C. Watson, J. S. Sturgeon, Isaac Evans, W. Halbert, C. Hegard, J. W. Bartlett, Peter Hall, and W. M. Ward, who were indicted by a grand jury and tried and convicted for a violation of sections 2147 and 2148 of the Revised Statutes. The act for which they were indicted consisted in their returning to the reservation after having been expelled. They returned to fish in Pyramid Lake.

Mr. INGALLS. What are the terms of the sections to which the Senator alludes?

Mr. DOLPH. Section 2147 is as follows:

The Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and the Indian agents and subagents, shall have authority to remove from the Indian country all persons found therein contrary to law; and the President is authorized to direct the military force to be employed in such removal.

Section 2148 is—

If any person who has been removed from the Indian country shall thereafter at any time return or be found within the Indian country, he shall be liable to a penalty of $1,000.

Mr. Leathers and another party were indicted at the same term of court and convicted for a violation of another section of the same title, but the offense was different from the one mentioned of which these nine persons were convicted.

Mr. INGALLS. Had they previously been expelled from the reservation?

Mr. DOLPH. These persons had been previously expelled, but no question is now involved in regard to them. I merely refer to that matter to explain my remarks of yesterday.

Mr. INGALLS. Had Mr. Leathers been expelled?

Mr. DOLPH. No, sir; he was indicted under another section, which I will read now:

SEC. 2133. Any person other than an Indian who shall attempt to reside in the Indian country as a trader, or to introduce goods, or to trade therein without such license, shall forfeit all merchandise offered for sale to the Indians, or found in his possession, and shall moreover be liable to a penalty of $500.

This was Mr. Leathers's case. The papers relating to all these cases being before the committee, I was in error in stating yesterday that Mr. Leathers was indicted for fishing in Pyramid Lake. As I desire that the facts in regard to Mr. Leathers's case may be fully explained I will read from his petition presented to the President for pardon. He states:

On the 6th day of February, A. D. 1879, he was duly indicted by the Grand Jury of the United States for the district of Nevada under sections 2133 and 2139 of the Revised Statutes of the said United States, the indictment of said grand jury containing two counts, charging your petitioner with attempting to reside as a trader and to introduce goods and to trade in the Indian country in the district of Nevada without a license, as required by law.

And he further represents:

And your petitioner respectfully represents that he honestly and really at all times believed that his place of business was located outside of the limits of the said reservation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which the Secretary will report.

Mr. DOLPH. I hope, as my remarks will be very brief, the Senate will by unanimous consent permit me to conclude.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the Senator proceeding to finish his remarks in respect to this bill? The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOLPH. I will continue reading from the petition of Mr. Leathers:

That the posts and monuments set up by the Indian agents in charge of said reservation to mark and designate the boundaries thereof were not truly placed, and were calculated to, and did, mislead your petitioner, as fully appears by the special findings of the jury in the case.

Now I will read from the special finding. These questions were submitted to the jury, and they were answered as follows:

First. Is the defendant's place of business within the Pyramid Lake Indian reservation as the red lines are shown on the map of Mr. Monroe?
Yes.
Second. Is the defendant's place of business within the lines of said reservation as marked by the wooden posts set up at the instance of Batemen, the Indian agent?
No.
Third. Is the defendant's place of business within the lines of the reservation as those lines are or were marked by the stone monuments set up by Mr. Monroe at the time of surveying the reservation?
No.

Which findings of the jury show that the place of business of the defendant in the case was not within the limits of the reservation as the boundaries had been staked out by the surveyor and the Indian agent. Attached to the petition is the following recommendation and statement signed by Judge Hillyer, the district judge who tried the case, the district attorney who prosecuted the case, the United States marshal for the district, and the Indian agent at the Pyramid Lake reservation:

I am of the opinion that the facts which appear in the case show that the statements in the forgoing petition are true and that they authorize the granting of the pardon prayed for. The conduct of the Government through its local offices for many years in relation to the reservation mentioned has been such as to induce the larger portion of the entire population of Western Nevada to believe there was no legal reservation. The survey was by triangulation; no monuments were set up by the surveyors except at the angles and corners, and then only at long distances and on top of mountain peaks; and the only designation of boundaries was made subsequent to survey by the agent, and his designation was erroneous and misled the petitioner Leathers. I heartily join my petition with his for a free pardon.

In addition, section 2124 of the same title provides:

All penalties which shall accrue under this title shall be sued for and recovered in an action in the nature of an action of debt, in the name of the United States, before any court having jurisdiction of the same, in any State or Territory in which the defendant shall be arrested or found, the one-half to the use of the informer and the other half to the use of the United States, except when the prosecution shall be first instituted on behalf of the United States, in which case the whole shall be to their use.

Here the proceeding was by indictment; and when these cases were presented to the Department of Justice the Attorney-General appears to have called the attention of the United States district attorney to the fact that the court had proceeded without jurisdiction, by indictment by a grand jury and a trial by a petit jury, when the court only had jurisdiction of an action in the nature of a civil action to recover the penalty; and in this connection I desire to have the Secretary read the letters referred to yesterday to show that I am right in what I state.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letters will be read by the Secretary as part of the remarks of the Senator from Oregon.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE UNITED STATES ATTORNEY,
Reno, February 26, 1880.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter, of date the 17th ultimo, relative to the construction of section 2148, Revised Statutes. As you are already advised, there are some eight or nine cases in which judgment has been deferred to await the result of applications for pardon. The question as to the jurisdiction has been evidently overlooked by counsel for defendants and both circuit and district judges. My position is somewhat embarrassing in these cases. It hardly seems proper for me, or in the line of my duty as a prosecuting officer, to press these cases to a final judgment of fine, which will probably result in imprisonment, with the knowledge that the court has no jurisdiction. On the other hand, should I confess the error now the moral effect of these convictions will be lost, and the officers at the Indian agency will be caused much annoyance and trouble. It seems an anomaly to issue pardons for non-existing offenses, yet if they could be granted consistently with the position the Government ought to occupy the whole matter would be relieved from embarrassment.

Very respectfully,

C. J. VARIAN, United States Attorney.

Hon. CHARLES DEVENS,
Attorney-General, Washington.

Mr. DOLPH. As that is the latest letter, I shall not ask for the reading of others. That letter shows that the court proceeded in these cases without jurisdiction; that this man was tried, convicted, and fined by a court not having jurisdiction, inasmuch as it now appears that this was not only a case that appealed strongly for executive clemency but a case in which the court had no jurisdiction; that the money collected upon the judgment has been paid into the Treasury of the United States and remains there; that the committee has not reported in favor of the entire claim, but only in favor of reimbursing the claimant the amount of the fine paid by him. I hope that the Senator from Kansas is now satisfied not only that this is a meritorious case but that the committee has not in its report gone beyond the line of the law and the precedents.

STATE NATIONAL BANK OF LOUISIANA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 339) for the relief of the State National Bank of Louisiana.

Mr. JACKSON. That bill has been twice carefully examined by the Committee on Claims. The report states the facts clearly and fully, and unless some statement is to be answered I shall not occupy the time of the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. I will ask the Senator from Tennessee, as a break in the day has already been made, if he will not allow the same order to be made to-day as was made yesterday, to lay aside this unfinished business informally in order to consider the bank bill.

Mr. JACKSON. I will do so if there is to be further discussion, but I presume there will be no objection to this bill. It has been carefully examined by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. JACKSON. I suggest that one amendment should be made in line 12, after the word "bank," to insert "or the United States;" so that the United States shall have the benefit of evidence already taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. INGALLS. Is this the bill that has been under discussion on a previous day?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. In regard to payment for certain cotton that was purchased by the State Bank of Louisiana?

Mr. JACKSON. Not for the payment of the claim, but for a reference of the case to the Court of Claims.

Mr. INGALLS. I remember indistinctly hearing the report read, and recall now that I was unable to ascertain from the language of the report what the amount involved in the controversy was.

Mr. JACKSON. The proceeds of three hundred and sixty-seven bales of cotton.

Mr. INGALLS. And how much was that in money?

Mr. JACKSON. The memorial claims, I believe, some $90,000.

Mr. INGALLS. And the purpose of this bill is to refer the claim to the Court of Claims for adjudication, waiving the bar of the statute?

Mr. JACKSON. That is all.

Mr. INGALLS. As the statute of limitation does not run against the Government, I have been usually opposed to the idea of its being insisted upon by the Government, and under ordinary circumstances I should be in favor of allowing claimants to come into court to prove their claims without regard to the period of time; but my recollection of this case is that this cotton was purchased during the continuance of the war, in 1863. Am I correct?

Mr. JACKSON. There was an executory contract entered into for the purchase of the cotton. It remained in the possession of the venders until after the restriction on commercial intercourse had been removed, and was delivered in the summer of 1865.

Mr. INGALLS. That is to say, this bank being situated in the city of New Orleans in 1863, which was then in the custody and control of the national forces, was contracting for the purchase of cotton with persons residing in the insurrectionary districts that were beyond the control of the United States forces.

Mr. JACKSON. That is the fact.

Mr. INGALLS. Was the cotton paid for?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. By the bank?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. And the Senator calls that an executory contract?

Mr. JACKSON. But it was left in the possession of the vender for future delivery.

Mr. INGALLS. But so far as ownership was concerned, it was the property of the bank.

Mr. JACKSON. I suppose so, certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. And the bank had paid out the entire value of the cotton to these persons residing in the insurrectionary districts and presumably in rebellion against the United States Government; and the proposition now is to allow the bank that had paid this money to these men who were in a condition of open and flagrant rebellion against the Government of the United States, the bank knowing that to be so, and after the claim has been twice or thrice adjudicated adversely to the bank by the Treasury Department, to go before the Court of Claims and again insist upon its trial without regard to the limitation of time. Is that the proposition?

Mr. JACKSON. That is the proposition.

Mr. INGALLS. I think the bill ought not to pass. I shall ask for the yeas and nays on it.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I will state briefly to the Senate the facts in this case. There have been two favorable reports. It is true the cotton was purchased in 1863, the bank residing in New Orleans, then in possession of the Federal forces, and the venders of the cotton residing in the insurrectionary districts. The cotton remained in possession of the venders, no delivery being made, and in 1865 after the restrictions upon commercial intercourse were removed the cotton was voluntarily delivered by the venders when it was lawful for them to deliver it, to ratify the old contract or make a new contract in reference to the subject. This was the private property of the owners; no intervening right had attached on the part of the General Government; and they voluntarily, after they could do so lawfully, came forward and surrendered the cotton, reaffirmed the contract. This they did at a date when they could do so lawfully.

Under the act in relation to captured and abandoned property the Government holds the proceeds of this cotton in trust for somebody. The owners voluntarily surrendered their claim and did so at a time when they could do so lawfully. The Government holds the proceeds of this cotton in trust for some one, and of course they must be in trust for the bank. We simply propose to allow the bank to go and assert its legal right and claim in the Court of Claims. We do not adjudicate anything; we do not settle any right. The committee are not inclined to refer any case to the Court of Claims unless there be a prima facie showing in behalf of the claim. The questions involved in this case are such that we conceived it to be right that the Court of Claims should pass upon them. The claimant presented the claim to the Treasury Department in 1874 and before any action was taken it was barred by the statute of limitations; and now the object of the bill is simply to allow the claimant to go before the Court of Claims and establish, if he can do so, his right to the proceeds of this cotton, the Government holding those proceeds in trust for somebody.

Mr. INGALLS. The statement made by the Senator from Tennessee does not change the fact that this was originally an unlawful contract.

Mr. JACKSON. To be sure it was.

Mr. INGALLS. It was a contract that the bank had no right to make. In violation of law they purchased cotton in the possession of men residing in the surrectionary districts, who were in rebellion against the laws and Government of the United States. The reason of that restriction was obvious, because the money going into their possession was undoubtedly used for the purpose, as far as it could be so employed, of overthrowing the jurisdiction and power and authority of the Government and defeating its armies; and because in 1865 after the war closed these men came in and reaffirmed a contract that was void ab initio it does not give these persons any standing in court or in Congress. It seems strange to me that the Senator from Tennessee, with his knowledge of the law, should present that as an argument why the Senate should adopt this bill, because no one can know better than he, admitting that the contract was ab initio void, in violation of the laws of the United States, that no subsequent act between these wrongdoers could bind the Government to pay the proceeds of this property to either of these parties. I do not, so far as I am concerned, desire by my vote to say that this contract has any standing whatever in court, to say that they have any legal right which can be enforced anywhere; and when the Senator states that this is merely a bill to give these persons an opportunity to present their claim before a tribunal for adjudication, he asks us to say that they have rights that can be adjudicated. For one, sir, I deny it.

Mr. JACKSON. The Senator from Kansas and myself differ upon one proposition and one only. If this case stood upon the contract made in 1863, and upon that alone, the committee would not have reported in favor of this bill, because that committee adhere to the law and the policy of the Government then in force of prohibiting that sort of commercial intercourse. But the case does not rest there. After intercourse was lawful and after it was permitted by the proclamation of the President, the venders, who would have had a right to resist the execution of the contract, came forward voluntarily and performed it. They performed it and delivered the cotton. Before any right of the Government had attached, they delivered the cotton and executed the contract when it was lawful for them to do so, when commercial restrictions by the proclamation of the President had been withdrawn and annulled. I differ with the Senator from Kansas when he says that a contract originally void could not be affirmed under such circumstances. When the reason and the policy which made the contract void had ceased, then the parties could affirm it and make it valid.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator affirm that when this cotton was purchased in 1863 and the money paid for it it was not made, so far as the parties could make it, complete? The fact that the cotton remained in the possession of the venders in the insurrectionary districts did not change the right of the bank; it paid its money; so far as it could be it was the owner of the cotton; it was merely in the custody of other parties; and because they came forward in 1865 or 1866 and delivered the cotton over to the bank that had unlawfully purchased it in 1863, that fact did not make it a new contract or the reaffirmation of an old one.

Mr. JACKSON. If the venders had resisted the delivery of the cotton, I say, the transaction being illegal, they could have successfully refused to deliver the cotton. If the Government of the United States had found and seized the cotton in the hands of the venders during actual hostilities it could have captured it and seized it as against the bank. I admit that; but I say, having recognized, as these venders did, the moral obligation to deliver the cotton afterward and made the delivery when they could do so lawfully, no rights of the Government attached as against the venders. It never seized it for any act of the venders; it was seized in the possession of the bank, after the venders performed a contract that they could have refused to perform. It may have been illegal at the time it was made, but when performed and executed it was legal.

That is the principle involved, and that is the question we present, instead of deciding it finally by Congress, to be sent to the court for adjudication. Suppose we wipe out of view entirely the contract of 1863 because of its illegality, and they come forward in 1865, after commercial restrictions had been removed, and delivered the cotton voluntarily for an old debt or an illegal debt or anything you please, the Government has no right to complain; or, at any rate, the committee think that is a question which should be passed upon by the court.

Mr. INGALLS. To whom did the cotton belong after the bank had paid the money in 1863?

Mr. JACKSON. It belonged to the venders.

Mr. INGALLS. To the venders after they had sold it and got their money for it?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes, sir; because their contract was illegal.

Mr. INGALLS. A novel proposition.

Mr. JACKSON. They could have refused to deliver it; but having chosen to deliver the cotton afterward when they could lawfully do so, the Government ought not to interpose, and as it has the proceeds and holds them as a trustee, common honesty demands that the purchaser shall have his rights.

Mr. INGALLS. I think that the bank and the venders both violated the law, and the Government had the right to the cotton and the money.

Mr. JACKSON. To be sure, both violated the law in respect to the contract; but if the cotton was delivered in the summer of 1865, when it could be lawfully delivered, the Government was not hurt.

Mr. INGALLS. How could it be lawfully delivered in pursuance of an unlawful contract?

Mr. JACKSON. It was delivered when it was lawful to deliver it. Any void contract can be affirmed by the parties when the law or the policy which forbade it at the time has been changed when the ratification is attempted. That is the proposition, and no lawyer who will examine the question can doubt that.

Mr. INGALLS. Was not this whole matter adjudicated before the Treasury Department?

Mr. JACKSON. No, sir; they simply refused to entertain it because the transaction occurred in 1863.

Mr. INGALLS. Perhaps I did not understand the matter fully——

Mr. JACKSON. They could not adjudicate it.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand the proof was offered before the Treasury Department and the claim was rejected on the ground that the original contract was unlawful.

Mr. JACKSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. And that therefore the Government was rightfully in possession of the cotton and its proceeds.

Mr. JACKSON. No, not that. The Department refused relief because of the original contract; but I do not consider that the whole question in the case. The committee have thought proper, after twice considering it, to send the claimant to the Court of Claims and have his rights judicated; and the case can go from there to the Supreme Court of the United States, where all these questions will be considered and passed upon fully.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. HAMPTON. I beg to call the attention of the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] to the fact that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] requested me to say that he was paired with him.

Mr. LOGAN. On political questions, that is true. I do not consider this a political question.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like the attention of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. If this is in any sense a political question, I am paired with his colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. BECK. I do not think it is.

Mr. BLAIR. I voted, not supposing that a question of law was a political question.

Mr. HALE. My colleague [Mr. FRYE] is absent by order of the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BECK. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] requested me to say that he and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] are absent by order of the Senate on public business and that they are paired with each other.

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 15; as follows:

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 152) for the relief of E. H. George and H. W. Walker; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

NATIONAL BANK CIRCULATION.

Mr. BECK. I suppose the bank bill now comes up as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Not unless upon motion or request.

Mr. BECK. I move that it be taken up. It was understood yesterday that it would be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to proceeding to the consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] which was under consideration yesterday?

Mr. INGALLS. Does it not come up as the unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not. The Chair hears no objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1155) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. SHERMAN in line 9, after the word "deposited," to insert:

Provided, That if any bonds so deposited bear a higher rate of annual interest than 3 per cent., additional circulating notes shall be issued equal in amount to one-half of the interest accruing on such bonds before their maturity in excess of 3 per cent. per annum, such amount to be ascertained and stated by the Comptroller of the Currency on the 1st day of July of each year hereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] is entitled to the floor on this bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood the Senator from Kentucky desired to speak first, but it is immaterial to me.

Mr. BECK. It is perfectly immaterial to me. I think perhaps as the Senator from Rhode Island has an amendment to the bill and I have none——

Mr. ALDRICH. No, I have no amendment to offer. I propose to discuss the pending bill and amendments. I do not intend to offer any amendment.

Mr. BECK. Does the Senator prefer that I should go on now?

Mr. ALDRICH. If it be equally agreeable to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. I will state as briefly as I can why I favor the measure reported by the Finance Committee. It received a great deal of consideration in all its phases, as the numerous amendments indicate. The original bill on the subject was introduced on the 4th day of December, the day after the Senate met, by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], in accordance with the somewhat urgent suggestion made in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury. It read thus:

That upon a deposit of bonds as required by law any national banking association making the same shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes of different denominations, in blank, registered and countersigned as provided by law, equal in amount to 90 per cent. of the average current market value of the United States bonds so transferred and delivered for the previous fiscal year; and at no time shall the total amount of such notes issued to any association exceed the amount at such time actually paid in of its capital stock, nor shall they exceed 95 per cent. of the market value of such bonds. And that all laws and parts of laws of the United States inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

When it came before the committee a discussion at once sprang up. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] moved to strike out all the provisions relative to 90 per cent. of the current market value of the bonds transferred and delivered and the words "not to exceed 95 per cent." and to insert in lieu thereof "equal in amount to the par value of the United States bonds so deposited."

Upon those two propositions debate in the committee lasted for a long time; on account of the absence of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], who was engaged elsewhere in very important business which resulted so gratifyingly to him and to all of us, the committee were tied; but after long discussions, and after the Senator from Delaware and myself, and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], and others had maintained the proposition reported as against others proposed, it was finally adopted. It so happened that the original bill as amended was not reported back to the Senate, but a bill which was introduced by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] on the 17th of January, almost word for word the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, was reported by the Senator from Delaware instead of the original bill as amended.

It makes no difference, of course, except that the responsibility for this proposition is on the Senator from Delaware. The original bill as amended ought to have been reported, but it was not. That, however, as I said, is immaterial.

As to the merits, we all agreed that in the condition of our bonded debt and surplus revenue it was imperative that something should be done to give stability to the national-bank circulation. At the present rate of taxation, with only $274,000,000 of 3 per cent. bonds outstanding, the Secretary advised us, as the Senator from Delaware read yesterday, that in three years they would all be paid off. He showed us the banks held $201,000,000 of these 3 percents, and if they were all to be paid off in three years a dangerous contraction of the currency was likely to follow. Something, he assured us, had to be done, and the committee devoted itself carefully to see what was best; those of us who agreed to the bill as reported thought it was evidently fair and just, as the Government of the United States had only received par for its bonds, and was only expected to pay par for them, and as it had treated the now 3 percents pretty harshly in years gone by by reducing them from 5 and 6 per cent. to 4½ and 4 and 3½ and 3 per cent. by a sort of gentle coercion, and as the people who hold them now had to bring them down to their present low rate of interest, and as they were as good as gold to-day, that there was no hardship in saying that if we increased circulation on any bonds we should increase it on these as well, although they bore little or no premium in the market.

The increase from 90 to 100 per cent. on all the bonds of course increases the circulation of the banks some thirty-odd millions of dollars at once. We all felt not disinclined to do that, especially as there had been a shrinkage of values in stocks and other property going on for the last year, perhaps running up to a thousand millions. A contraction took place to the amount of nine and a half millions last year in the national-bank circulation on account of the calling in of bonds, and we were assured by the Secretary that it is almost certain to go on much further. We felt that if we did authorize thirty millions more circulation to be issued the people would get the benefit of it in their business, even if the banks did make something out of it, and I did not care to discriminate against the 3 percents if they were not quite as valuable in the market as the fours and the four-and-a-halfs for the reason I have given.

I could not see if we gave the banks who are holding four-and-a-halfs and fours 10 per cent. more of circulation than they have now why they should complain if we give the banks who are holding the 3 percents the same. If we had left the 3 percents with circulation at 90 per cent., allowing the fours and four-and-a-halfs to have 100 per cent., they would be no better off, and I hardly think they will claim that the want of uniformity does them any harm. By giving that advantage to those banks now holding $201,000,000 of 3 percents which will be called in in a short time no injury is done, while the security for the circulation is ample after we allow them to have notes at par. It will recompense them in part for the trouble and expense they must soon incur by the necessary change they will be compelled to make by the retirement of the bonds now payable at the option of the Government.

I was not considering the relief of the banks as the main purpose of this bill. The amendments offered to it all seem to be based upon the idea, how much is it safe to give the banks; how much more than par can we afford to let them have?—as though it was a trade to see how much each bank can squeeze out of us because of the value of the securities they hold in the market at the present time. That was not the idea I was guided by. I was willing to increase the circulation, because the country required the increased circulation, because it was shrinking, and would continue to shrink largely if we did not offer inducements to national banks to continue taking out circulation, and because the 10 per cent. additional would make banking reasonably profitable on all classes of bonds, and if it made it a little more profitable to the banks holding the 3 percents than to those holding the fours and four-and-a-halfs the country would be no worse off and there would be no just cause for complaint.

The banks as such certainly need no further aid from the Government except what our necessities require us to give. A few years ago we renewed their charters. We gave them three years to pay up the lost notes when by the terms of their contract they were only entitled to six months, a privilege worth nearly a million of dollars to them. We relieved them last year from all the taxes upon their deposits and their capital, a privilege worth about $5,000,000 a year. In short, they were not the parties I was specially seeking to aid in allowing this increase in the circulation. If the bonds they now hold could be allowed to remain undisturbed they do not need this aid. Nor, as far as I know, are they asking for any special consideration. Our action looks to the good of the whole country by giving stability to its circulation. Senators may remember that as soon as it was officially developed that we had only $274,000,000 of 3 per cent. bonds remaining that we could pay before 1891, and that at the present rate of taxation they would all be paid off in three years, and it was nevertheless insisted upon by the Secretary that we had to pay forty or fifty million dollars a year to keep up the so-called sinking fund, I called the attention of the Senate to it, and asked the Secretary, by resolution of this body, to tell us what the condition of that sinking fund was, and how he proposed to use and apply the $50,000,000 a year he was demanding, when we had so few bonds that we could pay before 1891 and so few after that before 1907. The Secretary in his reply, in Executive Document No. 41, tells us that we have reduced the public debt since 1867 $1,205,340,363.95, or $455,115,333 more than would have been required by the sinking fund under the provisions of sections 3694 and 3696 of the Revised Statutes, had the requirements of the sinking-fund act been strictly complied with.

That report made it apparent that we were under no obligation to reduce our debt for the purpose of creating any further sinking fund, with $455,000,000 overpaid on that account; and he showed in that report also that there never was any account of that sort kept until 1870, and that it was never kept since 1870 otherwise than as a matter of book-keeping, the Department simply applying whatever surplus we had at the end of each year, no matter whether it was great or small. It must be manifest to all that it is absurd to say that if we have to pay $50,000,000 a year to the sinking fund and have $100,000,000 of surplus, the Secretary, by paying it all in the fiscal year 1883, on the 30th day of June, will leave us in debt to the sinking fund $50,000,000 for the year 1884; whereas if he paid $50,000,000 on the 30th day of June, and $50,000,000 on the 1st day of July, he would have canceled all the obligations to that fund for the years 1883 and 1884, as the payments were made in two fiscal years in the last case and in one in the first.

If the position of the Secretary is correct he could compel us to levy $50,000,000 of taxes, more or less, according to his discretion, in paying $50,000,000 one day or paying it the next day when he had the money, as our trustee, in his hands. I think that report makes this so plain a matter that the Senate will not require the levying of excessive taxes to maintain sinking funds under these conditions, when we are compelled to pass bills like the one now under consideration only because of the rapid and useless payment of bonds required to be kept out as the basis of our currency.

The Secretary tells us further in his annual report that he has no authority to purchase bonds at a premium before maturity or take up any bonds except those payable at the pleasure of the United States, unless by virtue of the act of March 3, 1881, which I read in the hearing of the Senate the other day for the purpose of showing that we ought not to allow that power to exist. The act of 1881 was passed, as I think I showed, to meet an emergency, as was stated by the Senator from Delaware who had charge of it. At the time we passed the bill it was agreed to unanimously, because we supposed it only proposed to allow him to use the money he had on hand to buy such bonds at par as were payable at the pleasure of the United States, and thus prevent a violent contraction of the currency before Congress could again meet by locking up a large amount of surplus revenue in the Treasury.

The great object I have in view is to reduce taxation to the wants of the Government, and not pay off outstanding bonds which national banks and others want and need. The object of other gentlemen—and that is the fault I find with all the proposed amendments—seems to me to be to prepare for the maintenance of a system of taxation beyond the necessities of the Government, and to enhance the value of the bonds far beyond what is needed for a fixed, stable, and simple basis for our currency—in short, to give the banks all that they can possibly squeeze out of the Government by keeping up a speculative price on the bonds. This is illustrated by the extent to which the Senator from Ohio yesterday proposed to go as to the $67,000,000 of currency sixes (as you observed by the tables which he furnished us), that on the currency sixes due in 1899 the banks should be allowed in currency $13.75 for every $10 of bonds deposited, giving them, as the Senator from New Jersey showed, 3 or 4 per cent. more of currency than the bonds would sell for in the market.

So with the four-and-a-halfs and so with the fours; the whole effect of these various schemes being to force up the price of the bonds of the United States, by giving them additional use, to the highest possible point to which they can be forced in a speculative market, and then continue to impose taxes so that we shall have a large annual surplus, as we had the year before last, of over $145,000,000, and last year of $132,879,000, and up to the 1st day of February of the current fiscal year of $65,000,000. It will be over $100,000,000 for the whole year, though the Secretary estimated it at only $85,000,000. The effect will be to force the collection, by the keeping up of taxation, of an enormous surplus of revenue, and then to go into the market and buy these bonds, which you have forced up to the highest possible rate, at any price that the holders see fit to ask for them, and make the people of the United States pay much more than they would be worth but for the artificial value Congress has given them. That seems to be the policy of those who are advocating all these various amendments in the interests of the banks.

Why should these bonds be forced up to an unnatural price? What interest has the United States in doing it? Whenever there is any surplus revenue in the Treasury it must be paid out for some purpose. The worst possible contraction of currency that could befall the people of this country and the most certain destruction of their prosperity would be to allow $100,000,000 surplus revenue collected by taxation, direct or indirect, to remain locked up in the Treasury. That means $100,000,000 of contraction of the currency at once. When that condition of things is brought about outstanding bonds will have to be bought at any premium at which they can be obtained. Of course the more valuable these bonds can be made now the higher premium we will have to pay when we are compelled to buy them, as we soon will be under our existing tariff and tax laws.

I introduced a bill, which I hope to pass, now pending before the Finance Committee—I presume it will be reported adversely—prohibiting the Secretary of the Treasury from buying bonds at a premium without the further order of Congress, as the act of March 3, 1881, never intended to give him that power. I admit that he has it under the letter of the law, and if the bonds of the United States can be made to rise from 21 or 24 per cent. up to 40 per cent., then the holders of the bonds will realize that much more when the interests of the Government require it to buy the bonds or allow the money collected to be locked up in the Treasury.

The object of each move I have made—and I think that is the feeling of the Senator from Delaware and others on the committee who agree with me in regard to this bill—has been simply to protect the currency and maintain the circulation of the bank notes by making it reasonably profitable to the banks to take out circulation, giving them par in notes for all the bonds they hold, not looking specially at the question of the interest of the banks outside of or beyond the general welfare, not looking at the speculative value of the bonds, not seeking unnecessarily to increase their value, when we may soon become the largest purchaser of them, as we shall surely soon become unless we reduce taxation.

One object I have in speaking now is to call attention to the fact that we need no sinking fund, that we need no surplus revenue beyond the wants of the Government, that there is no beneficial object in paying off the bonds rapidly now, because $274,000,000 are all that are outstanding within reach before 1891, of which $201,000,000 are held by the banks, many of them new banks, that desire to hold them, and to urge that we ought to reduce taxation down to the point that will fairly supply the wants of the Government and allow the outstanding bonds to remain and give the people relief from burdens and not keep up taxes to raise over $100,000,000 surplus annually, as we are doing now, for the purpose of buying bonds at an enormous premium. The fours have already gone from 21 to 24 per cent. since the 1st day of December, as I understand, perhaps by reason of this agitation. Allow the banks to have them as proposed by the amendments to this bill and they will go up to 130. Let the Government keep up its revenue and collect $100,000,000 surplus, as we shall do if the laws remain as they are, and in order to avoid the contraction of currency caused by that $100,000,000 being locked up in the Treasury, we shall have to buy the bonds and they will go to 140.

Gentlemen, if there are any such who look specially at the interests of the banks in this bill, may very well endeavor to strain them up to the highest possible price; but those who are endeavoring only to maintain the currency of the country, and yet are endeavoring to protect the banks properly, but not to become their advocates for the purpose of enabling them to make all the money they can, in my judgment can not go any further than the bill reported by the Senator from Delaware goes.

Why, sir, the Senator from Ohio, and, I believe, a majority of the Finance Committee, all who claim to be the leading financial minds of the country, never fail to denounce the silver dollar, as the Senator from Ohio did yesterday, and tell of the embarrassments coming on the country by reason of it, how gold is going to be banished, and how untold ills are threatening us every day. When we restored the silver dollar years ago those same arguments were made. I have the speeches of eight or ten of the leading financial gentlemen before me, and I am almost tempted to read them now to show what evils they predicted years ago would come upon us long before now. Those evils have not come; they are, I believe, as remote now as they were then. They told us gold would fly from the country. We have had the balance of trade in our favor to the amount of $105,000,000 this year, and yet we have exported, I believe, more gold and silver than we imported. We had a large balance of trade in our favor last year, and the difference between gold and silver exports and imports was only about a million and a half.

Let us look and see what the Treasury report shows about this much-despised silver dollar. I heard a distinguished Senator, whose name I will not call, but he is before me now, a leader on the other side of the Chamber, say, and say truly, that the reason silver is so much below gold is because it had been denounced and abused by those who ought to have protected it; that it never had been treated by its own Government or by the men who were administering its affairs as though they desired to make it either respectable, valuable, or desirable. I think until an administration is in power that will say to the people who are seeking to maintain silver coinage all over the world that we will stand by them in good faith, and not in every way, indirectly and directly, abuse our own money and threaten to stop its coinage and repeal everything connected with its use, never until it is supported by those in power will silver have fair play in this country. Yet in spite of all that, the Secretary has to tell us in his last monthly report that there are now gold and silver certificates to the amount of $211,387,671 outstanding, largely over half of it in silver. The contraction of the national-bank currency was only about $9,000,000 during the last year; the increase of silver certificates, the Secretary tells us, was over $14,000,000. These $211,387,671 in the form of gold and silver certificates are more than supplying whatever contraction or diminution may go on in the volume of the bank currency, and it is in a shape that it can not be withdrawn at once, as bank circulation can be, because, looking at the banks from any standpoint you please, they are not agents; their managers are the agents of their stockholders. The moment you appreciate the price of their bonds so high, whether they are currency sixes or any other description, that they can make more money by selling the bonds and giving up their circulation than they can by holding on to the bonds and keeping their circulation they will return the circulation and sell the bonds, and tell Congress, if it complains, that they are not the agents of this Government, they are the agents of their own stockholders; and they will contract or expand their currency whenever they find it profitable to do so.

This Government has no assurance from them that they are going to maintain a stable currency. They will not maintain it a day longer than it is their interest to do so; and whenever you adopt any of the amendments proposed to this bill, that proposed by the Senator from Ohio yesterday or any other looking to see how high we can appreciate the bonds, how many privileges can be given the banks, the very moment they get bonds to the point where large sums of money go into the pockets of their stockholders by a sale of bonds your currency is contracted and the bonds are sold. They have a right to do it, and they would not be faithful agents if they did not do it. Therefore it is that the gold and silver certificates which are now outstanding in the hands of the unorganized masses of the people for gold and silver deposited in the Treasury are the safeguard against that contraction which the banks at any moment may bring upon the people of this country by selling their bonds whenever you put them to a price where it is their interest to do so or keep up surplus revenue which must be applied to the purchase of them.

I have the statement here of the Comptroller of the Currency, Mr. Knox, in answer to questions put to him by the Senator from Delaware, which shows that he was entirely content with this bill. It might be improved in the interest of the banks. Let me read a few words from his interview with the Committee on Finance:

Senator BAYARD. I was not here when you first came, and possibly you may have already discussed the matter. It was my suggestion, and that of others, too, that we should content ourselves by a simple increase of the percentage of currency from ninety to one hundred, the face value of the bonds, without reference to the amount of interest paid, or anything else, treating all the bonds alike; and I understood you to say just now that the right to increase the currency from 90 to 100 per cent. would, in your opinion, increase the value of the obligation.

Comptroller KNOX. Yes.

Senator BAYARD. And of course if you withhold it from some and give it to others there will be a discrimination in that way. Do you see any objection to an increase from 90 to 100 per cent. made broadcast upon all the obligations of the United States which are not deposited as security for currency?

Comptroller KNOX. I am decidedly in favor of having that done. Of course I would like to have something more than that done; but I think that would have a decidedly good effect.

Senator BAYARD. Is there any ulterior or incidental result that is not obvious upon the face of the proposition, if we simply strike out 90 and 100? I am not speaking, of course, of the effects to be produced in the case of the individual holders, because that is an incident of the time. It is suggested that in this way it may possibly at the moment make it advisable for the holders of bonds, whether banks or others, to sell them instead of keeping them. But that is their option.

The CHAIRMAN. If we were to make all bonds depositable with an issue up to par, would not the relief come to the country almost instantly and then cease instead of continuing in the future?

Comptroller KNOX. The effect would be to raise the value of the bond slightly in the market, but the value of the circulation would increase in greater proportion.

Another objection that was very strong against basing circulation on the market value of these securities, is this: The fours are, say, 121 or 124; the four-and-a-halfs are, say, 115. If our circulation is largely in excess of the par value it has to be changed, according to the provisions of the amendments, so as to maintain that ratio whenever the bonds fall from any cause. We are prosperous now; I hope we shall always continue to be; but we may not. We may have foreign wars; we may have other complications; we may have panics, real or fictitious, and the bonds of the United States may go down 10 per cent. in a week. What happens then? Under the amendments now proposed the currency has to be contracted by the Comptroller to the extent that the bonds fall. The United States at the very time it is called upon most loudly and earnestly to support its own credit is compelled by these amendments to accept the truth of the clamor and admit the truth of the depreciation of its bonds, and that too at the very time when we ought to be bolstering up our credit and maintaining it by every means in our power. Think of the folly of contracting the currency in the face of a panic, contracting it in the face of a demand from our enemies. That ought not to be. That will not be under the bill that is now presented. The bonds may be worth more if this bill passes than they are now. I do not know whether the banks that now hold the high-premium bonds paid more than par for them or not. The Government got no more than par; the Government will pay no more than par. We say, "They are as good as gold, and you can have, for the use of the people and your own benefit, circulation upon them up to par, and you can use any kind you like or can get," but we will not put ourselves in a position to be confessing, when by any combination of men, whether foreign or domestic, it is sought to break down the value of the bonds, that we must contract our currency when they combine against us.

It was very well said yesterday by the Senator from Delaware that the proposition we make is a plain and simple one. We were, I repeat, not looking to the banks. The banks, as I have said, have been relieved of taxation to the extent of five million a year; they are relieved from paying their lost notes for three years instead of six months; they have had a renewal of their charters, and they can afford to wait for any further relief in regard to the tax on their circulation until we have given other interests of the country the relief they need. What we have to do now, if we are wise men, is to reduce taxation and stop accumulating great annual surpluses which only disturb business and entail in the end great loss. I am not now going to say how we should reduce taxation. I have very clear ideas as to how it should be done, but that would open a subject about which my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] and myself would differ very widely. This, I will repeat: we ought to reduce taxation; the interest of the country demands it; we ought to allow the bonds which are outstanding to remain, drawing in only such surplus as would make it safe according to the taxation we must impose for ordinary expenditures.

By the way, I may say just here if we do upon any occasion fail to lay enough taxes to pay all the expenditures we may make no great harm will be done in the present condition of the credit of the United States. The Secretary tells us he has cash available and in the Treasury on the 1st day of February, 1884, to the amount of $150,775,412.78 in gold lying idle, professedly to protect the greenbacks. If at any time we fail to lay quite as much taxation as the necessities of the Government require in any particular year, fifty millions, yes, seventy-five millions of that one hundred and fifty million, could well be used without the Government of the United States or its credit being injured for a moment by the use of it. There never was any use for half that much money lying there. It may have been well in times gone by, when people doubted our credit, to have something, but to allow one hundred and fifty millions of gold to be lying there now is absurd. There is no man in America or Europe who can say it is needed to secure any obligation of the United States.

I mention that to show that we can reduce our taxes now, in my judgment, safely $75,000,000 a year and still have an ample margin; and that is what we ought to address ourselves to instead of endeavoring to pay in three years $274,000,000 of bonds, which is all we can pay before December, 1891, and then go into market to buy others at a premium, buy them at any premium anybody sees fit to ask, because, I repeat, the moment we have a large surplus of money in the Treasury we are compelled to buy at any premium because having $100,000,000 surplus locked up in the Treasury would bring panic and disaster to the country in a worse form even than the payment of the premium would. It is a question whether we have not gone too far instead of not far enough.

I think the majority of the committee who voted for this bill were liberal to the banks. However, the banks are out of politics now. I believe there is nobody making war on them nor are they as such interfering in political affairs. We need their circulation for a growing country, and therefore it will be a benefit to us all to maintain it. We propose to say to them, however, that we are only doing this because the currency of the country requires it. It is all they ought to ask. I am opposed to any effort to-day to see if something more can not be squeezed out of us, to see if the bonds can not be appreciated still higher, so that we shall have to buy them at a still higher premium. If the protected and favored classes can raise a clamor about American industry and labor or something else, to prevent a reduction of taxes, they will of course get an enormous premium on the 4 per cent. bonds; they may force us to buy them at premiums perhaps double the rate existing to-day. It is our duty to guard against that. For these and many other reasons which I might give I support the bill as reported, and shall oppose all the amendments that seek to give the banks anything more than this bill proposes to do.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I do not think I can be tempted to go into the subject of general taxation that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has been so long discussing; I merely propose to occupy a few moments in talking about the bill that is before the Senate; and I wish to say in advance that so far as the bill is concerned it is really inadequate to give any permanent relief. I do not understand that any of us are here advocating a measure for the benefit particularly of the national banks. No one of them has petitioned for any relief. The sole object of the bill and of the amendments before us is to give some relief to the people and some security for the future.

The business of the country has shown in the last week that our measure is insufficient, or that while the proposition has been pending here of allowing 10 per cent. addition to the amount of circulation upon the bonds deposited by the national banks, at the end of one week over $2,000,000 of circulation was surrendered to the Treasury by the national banks, and the bill as proposed by the Senator from Delaware or the Senator from New Jersey now covers over $200,000,000 of the 3 per cents. Everybody knows that to that extent it must prove a mere temporary expedient, and that those 3 per cent. bonds will soon be paid off and cease as any security for bank circulation. Therefore an increase of circulation on that amount will not afford the slightest permanent benefit.

If there is to be anything done, something more than this bill is absolutely necessary. The fact is that men of capital do not find banking business profitable. You will see by the return of the Comptroller in his last report the exact amount that is made when bonds of the 4 per cent. character were only 21 per cent. premium. Now they are 23⅝ per cent. premium; but when they were only 21 per cent. premium all the profits that could be made by their use in national banks, if the rate of interest was at 6 per cent., was fifty-nine hundredths of 1 per cent.; if the rate was 7 per cent. the yearly profit on the circulation would be only thirty-seven hundredths of 1 per cent.; and now when they are 2⅝ per cent. beyond the price at the date of the Comptroller's report, it is quite obvious that the business is not a business that will attract new capital and new men to go into it. Men do not embark in any business where certain loss can be foreseen.

The question for us to consider is whether we will perpetuate a system, and give stability to it, that is for the benefit of the country, for the general welfare of the people. No one asks it for the benefit of the banks; but the question is whether we shall have a withdrawal of bank circulation at the rate of $2,000,000 a week, or even of $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 in the next coming year, and provide some sort of remedy for it.

The substitute proposed by me, in which I hope to have the concurrence of both sides of the Chamber, is to grant a circulation at par on the 3 percents, on the 4½ percents, and on the 6 percents—to that extent it is the same as the bill reported—and when you reach the long bonds having a long term to run, twenty-three years, it is proposed by the substitute that those bonds shall have at the present time 110 per cent. on the dollar deposited, and to be reduced after 1891 at the rate of 1 per cent a year. This may possibly induce parties who wish to engage or continue in banking to purchase these bonds and start or continue business, but even this will hardly effect the object, I fear, so long as the full tax of 1 per cent. on circulation is continued. Many of the banks believe they would lose money by it. They cannot afford to continue the business unless that tax shall be reduced or modified.

When my proposed substitute is read I think it will be easily understood and interpreted everywhere alike. It is at par for all the bonds that have been issued and registered except the 4 percents, and it is 10 per cent. more upon those until 1891, and then year by year 1 per cent. less. The obligation of the United States is just as great to pay the interest at the rate of 4 per cent. as it is the principal. The difference between a bond bearing 4 per cent. and 3 per cent. for twenty-three years is 23 per cent. We only propose to begin with the liberty of issuing circulation to the amount of 110 cents on the dollar.

In all of the failures of our banks hitherto none of them have used more than 70 per cent. of the deposit of bonds. Some of them have not in their failures used any part of the bonds, but have recovered by allowing the bonds to remain in the Treasury until the accumulation of interest has thus been sufficient to cover the whole amount of the deficiency.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator yield for a question there?

Mr. MORRILL. As I propose to occupy but a few moments I prefer not to be interrupted.

I wish to say, with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], that there is an absolute security so far as the people are represented who hold the circulation of these notes. There is no country in the world that to-day gives the security that we give for these national-bank notes. In the first place, we have a bond that sells at a premium and will sell at a premium hereafter. In addition to that every stockholder is held to the amount of stock he has in the bank in his private capacity for the redemption of the circulating notes.

I do not like to say I shall not support any one of these measures, because they will do something. I shall vote for any one of them that may receive the favor of a majority of the Senate; but the measure as presented in the amendment which I shall offer as a substitute, in my judgment, is something better than any of the other propositions which have been presented. No one can contend that there is the same security in a 3 per cent. bond payable at the option of the Government and a 4 per cent. bond payable twenty-three years hence. There is a positive difference in value. There is more than the difference that it is proposed to make, and it is not an equality to present a measure of this kind and give the same advantage to a 3 per cent. bond due at the option of the Government, likely soon to be paid, that we do for a bond payable twenty-three years hence.

The amendment proposed by my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] I see varies very materially from that proposed by him subsequently; but it will be seen by the calculation that is given in the RECORD of this morning that it proposes to give a circulation on Union Pacific currency bonds that will be more than upon any others, and more perhaps than their par when they arrive at maturity. I should be opposed to that, because they are payable in currency, and I would not at any time have the security that we are to offer below par. If the table is applicable, it would seem that the amount proposed January 1, 1899, would be in excess of par, but I may not be correct, for I confess I do not quite understand the table. The first measure proposes that there shall be 95 per cent. upon the principal and excess of interest over 3 per cent. I think that in the last measure it is proposed that the circulation shall be upon bonds at par and half of the rate of interest above 3 per cent. This, it will be seen, involves arithmetical computation, and will not be as readily understood as will the terms of the substitute offered by me.

If we are to do anything in relation to this matter it does seem to me that we ought to provide something which will have a stable and permanent character enough to induce those who may wish or be forced to change their 3 per cent. bonds or those who wish to embark in the business of national banking to purchase the long bonds, and not have a continual fluctuation in the market or in the amount of circulation that may be issued from day to day. If this could be accomplished I think it would be a very worthy object and one deserving our consideration.

It should be remembered that at the present time our bonds perhaps bear an extravagant rate of premium. Money in the New York market yesterday was 1½ and 2 per cent., and at the same time it was rising in the London market, the rate of interest having been increased by the Bank of England. How long it will be before gold will begin to flow out from this country to England we do not know, but at all events the proposition which I now send to the Chair and offer as a substitute I think is an improvement upon anything else that has been presented. I will ask the Chair if a substitute for the original bill is now in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For the whole bill?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order, but can not be acted upon until the text of the original is perfected by amendments that may be offered.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well; I will offer it as a substitute and ask to have it read. I will say in addition to what I have already said that I have added to the printed amendment, as it appears on the desks of Senators, a section that will include the gold banks throughout the country, so that they can have the same privilege as to circulation that other banks have. That is to say, they have now only 80 per cent., and hereafter they should have at least as much as others; they certainly ought not to fare any worse. I ask to have the substitute read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont proposes an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert a substitute. It will be reported for information, and the question will be put upon it after the proposed amendments to the text of the bill are disposed of.

The Secretary read as follows:

That upon any deposit already or hereafter made of United States bonds as required by law, any national banking association making the same shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes of different denominations in blank, registered and countersigned as provided by law, as follows: On United States 4 per cent. bonds deposited prior to January 1, 1890, an amount in the whole equal to 110 per cent. of the par value of such bonds: Provided, That the issue of circulating notes upon the 4 per cent. bonds deposited or held in the first year succeeding January 1, 1890, shall not exceed 109 per cent. of the par value of such bonds, and that the issue on such 4 per cent. bonds deposited or held in each succeeding year shall be 1 per cent. less than in the year preceding, until the limit of issue of such circulating notes is reduced to par: And provided further, That on the deposit of any bonds of the United States now authorized by law, except as herein otherwise provided, circulating notes may be issued to an amount not exceeding the par value of such bonds; and at no time shall the total amoun. of such notes issued to any association exceed the amount at such time actually paid in of its capital stock.

SEC. 2. That associations organized for the purpose of issuing notes payable in gold, under the provisions of section 5185 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, upon the deposit of any United States bonds bearing interest payable in gold with the Treasurer of the United States shall be entitled to receive circulating notes to the amount and in the manner prescribed in that act for other national banking associations.

SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws of the United States inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, this discussion has disclosed an unexpected degree of unanimity in favor of the national banking system. It is a subject of congratulation that the doubts which have heretofore found lodgment in the minds of Senators have been dispelled, and we find the representatives of both parties cordially co-operating to preserve the bank-note circulation from possible peril. A measure which seeks to maintain the sufficiency and stability of our currency is entitled to be considered in the spirit which has characterized this debate.

The Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD], in charge of the bill, has stated very clearly the character of the dangers which threaten our currency. He quoted from the last report of the Comptroller as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury has been compelled, on account of the large receipts of revenue in excess of expenditures, to call in rapidly for payment that portion of the bonded debt which is payable at the pleasure of the United States. During the year ending November 1 more than one hundred and five millions ($105,322,450) of the public debt has been paid, and all of the remaining 3½ per cent. bonds, amounting to $91,596,250, have been called for payment, and ceased to bear interest on November 1. Notwithstanding the fact that two hundred and sixty-two new banks were organized during the past year, with a capital of $28,654,350, depositing $9,375,550 of bonds as a security for circulating notes, the aggregate amount on deposit for that purpose has diminished from $362,490,650 to $352,907,300, a reduction of $9,583,350. More than forty millions of 3½ per cents held by the banks on November 1, 1882, have been withdrawn or called for payment: the threes have increased less than twenty-two millions, and the fours and four-and-a-halfs less than nine millions.

* * * Unless there shall be legislation by the present Congress which shall reduce the receipts of the Government, it is probable that the United States bonds will continue to be paid at the same rate as during the past year, in which event all the threes will be called for redemption within the next three years. This will reduce the bonds held by the banks from $353,000,000 to $151,000,000, and cause a contraction in the national-bank circulation of about $60,000,000 per annum.

The change in the character of securities deposited to secure circulation will be seen by the following:

NOVEMBER 1, 1882.
Four-and-a-halfs	$33,754,650
Fours	104,927,500
Three-and-a-halfs	40,606,350
Threes	179,675,550
Pacific sixes	3,526,000
Total	362,490,650
NOVEMBER 1, 1883.
Four-and-a-halfs	$41,319,700
Fours	106,164,850
Three-and-a-halfs	632,000
Threes	201,327,750
Pacific sixes	3,463,000
Total	352,937,300

This statement was based upon the condition of affairs on the 1st of November last.

I now desire to submit a statement of the bonds outstanding at the present time, the amount of each class deposited with the Treasurer as security for circulation, and the percentage of each class so deposited:

Total	.....	1,307,436,612	342,237,550	26.2

* At pleasure of Government.

The whole amount of bonds now outstanding is $1,307,436,612, and of these $342,237,550 are deposited by national banks to secure circulation. Of the 4 per cent. bonds, 14.5 per cent. are so deposited; of the 4½ per cent. bonds, 16.8 per cent.; of the currency sixes, 5.4, and of the 3 per cent. bonds, 74.3 per cent.

The proportion of the 3 percents deposited by banks has been constantly increasing. At the date of the Comptroller's report but two-thirds of the whole amount were held for circulation. At the present time nearly three-fourths are so held. The remaining portion will soon be absorbed by the banks, as they can be held more profitably for this purpose than for any other. On the 1st of November there were $352,937,300 in bonds deposited, against $342,237,550 on the 12th of February, showing a decrease since the 1st of November of $10,699,750. Of the bonds held on the 1st of November, 1883, there were $201,959,750 of threes and three-and-a-halfs, and on the 12th of February $189,477,950 of threes, a decrease of $12,481,800. Within that period, however, there have been called $20,356,700 of threes, showing that the banks must have bought about eight millions of threes to replace those which had been called and paid.

The bank-note circulation is in part based, as shown, upon $189,000,000 of 3 per cent. bonds, payable at the pleasure of the Government, and being paid at the rate of about $100,000,000 per annum. The rapidity of future payments will, of course, depend upon the amount of surplus revenue, which may be increased or decreased by legislation. It is safe to assume that these payments will not be less than fifty millions per annum, and they will probably considerably exceed that sum. But sixty-five million of the 3 percents are now held outside of the banks, and when these are absorbed subsequent calls will be likely to reduce the currency to the full extent of such calls.

But there is also danger of contraction from another source. The 4 and 4½ percents now held by the banks to the extent of $149,271,600 command such a premium that there is a constant temptation for the banks to sell their bonds and retire their notes, the profits on circulation at the present time, based on these bonds, not being sufficient to induce banks to hold them. It will thus be seen that all the bonds now held by the national banks to secure their circulation are either in danger of being called or of being sold by the banks to realize the profit resulting from the high rate of premium.

While it is true that from these causes there is danger of a serious contraction of the bank-note currency, it is not true that the business of the country is suffering from any contraction which has hitherto taken place.

There has, indeed, been a reduction since July 1, 1883, of $10,699,000 of bonds deposited to secure circulation, but the amount of our paper currency has not decreased.

I submit a table showing in detail the amount of legal-tender notes, of national-bank notes, and of silver certificates outstanding on the 1st of July of each year from 1878 to 1883, inclusive, and on the 1st day of February, 1884:

*See Treasurer's Report, page 13, for denominations. †See Treasurer's Report, page 12, for denominations. ‡January 24, 1884.

By this table we find that on the 1st of July, 1878, the total issue of paper currency of the kinds mentioned, not including gold certificates, was $672,657,900; and on the 1st of February, 1884, this had increased to $805,743,076. On the 1st of July last, at the close of the last fiscal year, the total amount of paper issue of the classes mentioned was $791,371,128, and on the 1st of February, 1884, was, as stated, $805,743,076. While the national-bank notes had been reduced during this period to the extent of between eight and nine million dollars, the issue of silver certificates had increased from $88,000,000 to $110,000,000, or an increase of twenty-two millions, resulting in a net increase of paper currency, aside from gold certificates, of $14,000,000.

If we include gold certificates in this statement the result will be still more striking. On the 1st of July, 1878, our total paper currency, including gold certificates, was $717,024,900; on the 1st of February, 1884, it was $906,993,696, showing an increase within that period of nearly two hundred millions of dollars. It may be said that the issue of gold certificates does not affect the question under discussion, and it does not, except to the extent that it gives greater mobility and activity to the gold circulation of the country.

It should be said that the amount of gold certificates outstanding has taken the place of an equal amount of gold coin, and that these certificates are almost entirely held by national banks as a part of their reserves, and, except so far as they crowd out the legal-tender notes and silver certificates heretofore held for these purposes, they do not affect the currency of the country.

It is evident that we are not suffering from any contraction or insufficiency of volume of currency. It is true that silver certificates are gradually taking the place of national-bank notes, and that the increase in amount of the former has up to this time more than kept pace with the decrease of the latter.

We are, however, in danger of serious contraction in the future from two causes. I have already alluded to that arising from the possible withdrawal of bonds. We are also liable to suffer from a withdrawal of gold from the country by an adverse balance of trade. The markets for our staple articles of produce in England and upon the continent are in such a state that we are liable to have this adverse balance at any time. The rates for money in New York are lower than in any market in the world. With the Bank of England rate at 3½ per cent. money is being loaned to-day in New York at 1 to 1½ per cent. Of course this wide difference in rates if continued would tend to increase the demand for gold shipments from this country. A withdrawal of $100,000,000 of gold within the next year with sixty to seventy-five million dollars of contraction of bank notes would create an alarming condition of affairs.

From these statements it is evident that our remedial legislation should be such measures as will give to our currency stability and certainty, and which will, if possible, guard against the danger of bank-note contraction to which I have alluded.

In considering the character of this legislation, we are met at the outset with certain limitations upon the action of Congress, fixed by public opinion or perhaps by our own ideas of a wise public policy. I believe no considerable number of Senators or Representatives would be found willing to consent to the substitution for the bonds now held as security for circulation of any other bond or security, either State, municipal, or foreign. I believe that they would not consent to any increase of the national debt, or to any continuance of it beyond the time now fixed by law for its payment, nor agree to surrender the option which the Government now holds to pay the 3 per cent. bonds at pleasure.

Within these limitations what remedies are possible? We can increase the percentage of circulation to be issued upon existing bonds, or we can provide for an exchange of the long bonds now bearing a high rate of interest into bonds bearing a lower rate of equal tenure. I believe that the latter remedy is the only one which will effectively meet the difficulties in this case. Senate bill No. 1050, which embodies this plan of relief, is not now before the Senate, but it was discussed somewhat yesterday by the honorable Senator from Ohio, and I want to put upon record, in answer to the objections which he then made, that it would not be operative and that the banks would not take advantage of it, an opinion of the Comptroller of the Currency given recently, which I will ask the Secretary to read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

In my opinion the best bill offered is that now pending in the Senate, which converts the fours into threes, giving 15 per cent. in cash to the holders as an inducement to make the exchange. The new threes which are to be issued under it are to run until 1907, the same date of payment as the fours for which they would be substituted. The new threes would be worth 108 to 109 in the market. I am satisfied that nearly all of the holders of the fours would be glad to make such an exchange, for the reason that the cash which they would receive in the transaction could be loaned at 6 per cent., while at present, invested as it is in the premium, it does not yield an income very much in excess of 2½ per cent. The beautiful feature of this proposed bill is that on each $100,000,000 of new long threes issued $15,000,000 of revenue would be disbursed, thus preventing the necessity of calling that amount of the threes which are now payable at the pleasure of the Government. Thus if $300,000,000 were exchanged during the present year, it would save the necessity of calling $45,000,000 of old threes during that period. All the trouble in reference to contraction of the circulation would be thus avoided through a process which is both advantageous to the Government and to the banks. There would be no further anxiety anywhere upon the subject, for the threes now held by the banks would continue to be held by them so long as the process of exchange of the fours to long threes was continued. I feel certain that long prior to the maturity of the four-and a-halfs all of the fours will have been converted into long threes, the Government at that date (which will be 1891) having no bond of any kind outstanding bearing interest at a higher rate than 3 per cent.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will also place in the RECORD, but will not stop to read them, computations made by the Government actuary, Mr. E. B. Elliott, showing the results to the Government and to the banks if this plan should be carried into effect:

UNITED STATES TREASURY DEPARTMENT.
Washington, D. C., January 21, 1884.

DEAR SIR: Your first two questions were as follows:

"1. With a realized rate of interest of 3 per cent., what sum could the Government now afford to pay on each $100 of bonds to have the rate of interest reduced from 4 to 3 per cent. on the bonds due July 1, 1907?"

"2. Same question, with a realized rate of interest of 2½ per cent."

In answer to the first question I would say that the Government could afford to pay on each $100 so exchanged $16.82.

In answer to the second question I would say that the Government could afford to pay on each $100 of bonds so exchanged $17.77.

Respectfully,

E. B. ELLIOTT,
Government Actuary.

Hon. NELSON W. ALDRICH,
United States Senate.

OFFICE OF GOVERNMENT ACTUARY,
UNITED STATES TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 23, 1884.

Hon. NELSON W. ALDRICH,
United States Senate:

DEAR SIR: I inclose herewith answers to the third inquiry of your note of the 15th instant.

The question was as follows:

"3. What would be the relative rates of entire and annual profit to a national bank on circulation based on 4 per cent. bonds due in 1907, bought at 123, and on a 3 per cent. bond due at same time bought at 108; 90 per cent. of par value to be issued in the first instance and 100 per cent. in the latter; the profits to be given at realized rates of interest of 5, 6, 7, and 8 per cent.?

Answer to question 3, as to relative rates of profit, bonds to run 23½ years.

Rate realized to investors.	Entire profit rate.		Annual profit rate.		Advantage to holders of 3 per cent. bonds at 108.
	4 per cent. bonds bought at 123.	3 per cent. bonds bought at 108.	4 per cent. bonds bought at 123.	3 per cent. bonds bought at 108.
					Per ct.
Five per cent	.10426	.18108	.00757	.01314	.56
Six per cent	.06819	.15842	.00543	.01262	.72
Seven per cent	.03781	.13868	.00324	.01207	.88
Eight per cent	.01041	.12424	.00099	.01151	1.05

I shall content myself with placing this opinion and these statements in contrast with the opinion given yesterday by the honorable Senator from Ohio, and shall not detain the Senate to discuss the bill at this time, but will consider the various plans for increasing circulation based on existing bonds.

The feature of the national banking system which has given that system its greatest hold upon popular favor has been the uniform value of its notes and the undoubted security which the note-holder has had at all times and under all circumstances. To destroy this security, to impair it in any way, or to adopt a plan which will require an intricate computation to determine either the measure or the adequacy of the security deposited, would be fatal to the system. The security must not only be undoubted, but the method of issue must be simple and easily understood.

The bill reported from the Finance Committee is both simple and safe; but will it guard against the dangers I have pointed out? I think it will not, and that the ultimate effect of it will be to accelerate and intensify the evil results which it is intended to obviate. In order to continue the existing amount of national-bank circulation it is necessary that the banks should exchange the 3 per cent. bonds which they now hold for those bearing a higher rate of interest and due at a later period. If payments of 3 per cent. bonds should be made with the rapidity which is anticipated by some Senators, it is evident that the only effective relief from rapid and arbitrary contraction must be found in making it profitable to banks to buy and hold long bonds as a basis for circulation.

Does the bill of the committee offer any inducement for banks to make this exchange? I think this question must be answered in the negative. It preserves the same relative relations between the various classes of bonds that now exist. It proposes to issue, instead of 90 per cent., 100 per cent., or par, upon all bonds. Let us examine for a moment what the effect would be upon the banks should the bill become a law. For this purpose I submit and place in the RECORD a statement showing the profits upon circulation based on these various classes of bonds both at 90 and at 100 per cent.

Table showing profits on circulation based on different classes of United States bonds, issued at the rates of 90 and 100 per cent. on the par value of the bonds; together with the difference in the profits based upon the two rates.

Bonds.	Premium.	Time to run.	Rate of interest.	90 per cent.	100 per cent.	Difference of profit.
Four per cent	124	23½ years	5	.66	.98	.32
Do	124	do	6	.44	.84	.40
Do	124	do	7	.22	.69	.47
Do	124	do	8	.00	.55	.55
Four and a half per cent	114	7¾ years	5	.76	1.11	.35
Do	114	do	6	.60	1.04	.44
Do	114	do	7	.44	.97	.53
Do	114	do	8	.28	.90	.62
Three per cent	104	5 years	5	.62	1.01	.39
Do	104	do	6	.51	.98	.47
Do	104	do	7	.39	.95	.56
Do	104	do	8	.27	.92	.65
Three per cent	100	1 year	5	1.56	1.95	.39
Do	100	do	6	1.46	1.95	.49
Do	100	do	7	1.36	1.95	.59
Do	110	do	8	1.26	1.95	.69

The table shows a greater increase in profits upon the threes than upon fours, and the change in relative position of the bonds, so far as it is changed at all, results in a benefit to the holders of 3 per cent. bonds.

On examination we find that a large portion of 4 per cent. bonds now held by banks to secure circulation were originally purchased in 1879 at par, and have been held continuously from that time to the present. The only important exception was in 1881, when there was a sudden rise in price and the amount was reduced by sales $20,000,000. With that exception the amount of 4 per cent. bonds held by banks has remained substantially unchanged, proving that banks have never bought these bonds at a high rate of premium as a basis of circulation. It is true that recently, under the hope that some legislation for their benefit might be secured, banks have increased their holdings in fours to the extent of two or three million dollars, but not more.

Banks that purchased the fours at par or less have retained them because they afford a large profit on the original investment.

I will place in the RECORD a statement showing the amount of 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds which have been held by the banks in each year from 1879 down to the present time:

United States bonds held as security for circulation by national banks.

Date.	4½ per cent. bonds.	4 per cent. bonds.	Aggregate of all bonds.
July 1, 1879	$35,056,550	$118,538,950	$354,254,600
July 1, 1880	37,760,950	126,076,300	361,652,050
July 1, 1881	32,600,500	93,637,700	360,488,400
July 1, 1882	32,752,650	97,429,800	357,812,700
July 1, 1883	39,408,500	104,954,650	353,029,500
February 12, 1884	41,944,900	107,382,700	342,210,050

This shows one increase of four-and-a-halfs of about $7,000,000 since 1879 and a decrease of fours of about $11,000,000 in the same time.

It is safe to assert that a bank can not afford to buy bonds at 124 or 125 and hold them as a basis for circulation at the present rate of profit, and this will be true whether you pass the bill reported by the committee or not. Suppose a bank of $100,000 capital entitled if the pending bill becomes a law to $100,000 in circulation. This involves the purchase of $100,000 in bonds at 24 per cent. premium, or $124,000 for bonds. One-quarter of the entire capital of the bank is thus placed in a premium account, which must be depreciated from year to year until it is entirely lost at the maturity of the bonds, and which may be destroyed or greatly reduced at any time by a financial panic or a period of great business depression. Will prudent business men buy bonds under these circumstances? I think not. They never have done it to any extent, and I do not think they will hereafter. They certainly will not unless the tax on circulation should be abolished.

Mr. MCPHERSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I ask the Senator in what manner his bill is a remedy? If, as he avers, no bank to-day can afford to buy the 4 per cent. bonds at 124 and receive in circulation the par value of the bonds, after the passage of his bill, if such a thing were possible, the bonds would increase in value 10 or 15 per cent. more. In what way would he disturb the proportion? Since this bill was agitated, the 1st day of December, the 4 per cent. bonds have risen 4 and 5 per cent. in their market value, and with the additional facility the Senator proposes to give the natural consequence will be that the bonds will rise in their market value.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not know to which measure the Senator alludes as my bill.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I speak of the one that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] has offered.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have already stated, and I will repeat, that I think the only remedy which would be effective in this case is to provide a long bond at a low rate of interest which can be held by banks at about par. If I am obliged to choose between expedients, between temporary remedies, I greatly prefer the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, because it does offer an inducement to banks to purchase and hold 4 per cent. bonds.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator then will see very clearly that he is debating a proposition not before the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not debating it; I am stating the defects in the bill reported by the Finance Committee as they appear to me; and I propose later to show that the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont is a better proposition. I have stated that banks have not bought 4 per cent. bonds to any extent and I have stated my belief that they will not, and have shown that for a series of years the amount held has not changed.

Now, it would have been more profitable in every year from 1879 to last year for banks to buy and to hold 4 per cent. bonds than it would be under the bill of the Senator from New Jersey. I propose to show that fact by a table which I will present, showing approximately the average annual price of these bonds in each year from 1878 down to the present time, with the realized rate of interest to purchasers of these bonds, and showing, I believe conclusively, that if banks have not bought these long bonds at a comparatively low rates of premium when they could have realized greater profits and better results, they will not buy them now with the greatly increased premium upon them.

Table showing the average annual price of bonds, with the realized rate of interest to investors.

[From Report of Comptroller of Currency for 1883.]

RATES OF INTEREST IN NEW YORK CITY.

The average rate of interest in New York city for each of the fiscal years from 1878 to 1883, inclusive, as ascertained from data derived from the Journal of Commerce and The Commercial and Financial Chronicle, was as follows:

For 1878, commercial paper, 5.1 per cent.
For 1879, commercial paper, 4.4 per cent.
For 1880, commercial paper, 5.3 per cent.
For 1881, commercial paper, 5.0 per cent.
For 1882, commercial paper, 5.4 per cent.
For 1883, commercial paper, 5.7 per cent.

The bill proposed by the Senator from New Jersey and adopted by the Finance Committee will immediately increase the amount of our paper currency to the extent of $30,000,000 or $35,000,000 at a time when the increase is not needed, but when the emergency comes, when the 3 per cent. bonds are to be rapidly decreased and when the temptation is even still stronger to sell 4 per cent. bonds, it will furnish no barrier to disastrous contraction. The 3 per cent. bonds pay 2 per cent. profit upon circulation; the 4 per cent. bonds only a trifle over three-quarters of 1 per cent. What sane man would buy 4 per cent. bonds at 124 premium when he can buy a bond at par that will realize him 2 per cent. profit?

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator is generous; perhaps he will yield again right in that connection.

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I want to call his attention to the natural consequence of the statement he has made. He says we are doing what we do not want to do at the present time.

Mr. ALDRICH. Perhaps I should have qualified it by saying what I do not want to do.

Mr. MCPHERSON. He also says he prefers the bill of the Senator from Vermont. The bill of the Senator from Vermont inflates the currency immediately $10,000,000 more than could possibly be done under the bill of the Finance Committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. I agree to that, and I will give my reasons for preferring that measure, even with this defect in it, as I proceed. It is true that the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont does increase the amount of currency obtainable more than the bill offered by the Senator from New Jersey, but it does another very important thing which the committee bill does not do. It offers an inducement to the banks to hold fours, which must be offered and accepted in order to retain anything like the present amount of national-bank note currency for a continued period.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator admit this fact? If the bonds rise 10 or 15 per cent. in value does it affect the situation? If the bonds should rise in market value in proportion to the amount of circulation you give, would it have that effect?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think I understand the Senator's question.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Would it be any inducement whatever to banks to invest in 4 percents if the natural consequence of passing the measure of the Senator from Vermont should be to increase the market value of the 4 per cent. bonds?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think it would. I will answer that question very frankly. If the bonds go up to 135 or 140, a result not likely to occur, I do not think the banks would buy them, even under the provisions of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Vermont.

I assume that the volume of our currency should not depend upon the fluctuating price of the securities upon which it is based. It should not depend upon the market value of securities, nor upon the prospective profits or losses of banks. It should be based upon a bond which would remain about par, and the volume of bank notes should be contracted or expanded to meet the changing requirements of business.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator from Rhode Island permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. PLUMB. I will ask him if there has been any relation, direct or indirect, between the recent diminution in the volume of the national-bank currency and the necessity of the country for the issue of that currency?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think there has been, for the reasons which I have suggested. We have two classes of bonds, as I have already stated: one worth a large premium, furnishing a great temptation for banks to sell; one constantly diminished by redemptions. This peculiar condition has prevented the natural increase of bank-note currency and is liable to precipitate violent contraction without regard to the wants of business.

Mr. PLUMB. Then, if I understand the logic of the Senator's statement, it is that if the volume of currency is based upon bonds that are at a considerable premium there will be the consequent inducement to the holders of the bonds to sell and realize the premium, irrespective of the demand of the country for currency.

Mr. ALDRICH. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PLUMB. And thus the currency will be based upon a shifting foundation so far as the volume is concerned. I am not speaking of the value at any particular time; but the volume of the currency is based upon a foundation which is constantly shifting.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not quite understand what the Senator means by "shifting."

Mr. PLUMB. That is to say, the question of the volume of the currency does not cut any figure with the bank, or does not amount to anything in regard to diminishing or increasing it, but it is subject to the profit which the bank seeks to realize on the currency.

Mr. ALDRICH. Undoubtedly, and it is this state of affairs that I want to find a remedy for.

I will say just a few words in regard to the proposition offered by the Senator from Vermont. It has some defects, I agree, but it seems to me to be the best and the simplest method which has been suggested which offers any inducement to banks to increase their holdings of 4 per cent. bonds. It proposes for the next six years to issue on the 4 per cent. bonds 110 per cent. of currency, with a regularly decreasing amount in the next ten years of 1 per cent. each year, and after 1900 to issue circulation to par. For thirteen years there will be no fluctuation, no forced contraction of currency, and for ten years there is a diminishing rate of 1 per cent. per annum. It is simple, it is easily understood, and I am in hopes that to some extent it would remedy the defects which I have pointed out in the bill offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

I desire to add just a few words in regard to the amendment last offered by the Senator from Ohio. I have already stated that I did not think it wise to propose or adopt any plan which would require an intricate and complex computation to determine the extent and adequacy of the security for national-bank circulation. This plan fixes an arbitrary sum, which represents neither the market value of the bonds nor the correct mathematical relation between the various classes, and proposes to issue currency based upon this. The effect of this amendment upon the various classes of bonds is to give an advantage to the currency sixes.

Mr. ALLISON. You are speaking of the amendment now.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am speaking of the amendment now pending. The measure as originally submitted would have given on one class of currency sixes, as the Senator from New Jersey pointed out yesterday, 137.75 on each $100 of currency, an amount in excess of the market value of the bonds; but the amendment as it is now presented would reduce the amount of currency to be issued on this class to 122½. There are only $63,400,000 of these bonds, issued at seven different times, varying in amounts from $640,000 to $29,000,000. They are in the hands of a very few holders.

If based on 4 per cent. bonds under the terms of the amendment offered by the chairman of the Finance Committee the profit on circulation, with interest at 6 per cent., as shown by a computation made in the Treasury Department, would be 1.04 per cent., on an average issue of 105 per cent.; on the 4½ per cent. bonds under the bill reported by the committee or the amendment offered by the chairman the profits would be precisely the same, 1.04 per cent.; on the 6 percents due in 1899, either by the original bill reported by the committee or by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, the profit would be 1.19 per cent., showing a greater rate of profit than upon any other class except the threes, on which the profit would be by the pending bill 1.95.

The market price to-day of currency sixes due in 1899 is about 137. This realizes a rate of interest to investors of about 2.93 per cent., while the 4 percents realize to investors but 2.66 per cent., showing that the classes of bonds having a longer time to run are more sought for in the market and have a higher relative value than the currency sixes, and showing also that under the pending bill the currency sixes have an advantage over the other bonds. By the amendment first offered by the Senator from Ohio the profit of circulation on currency sixes would be 2.48 per cent. Under the amendment last offered by him the profit would be 1.65 per cent.; showing that the only practical difference between these plans is a difference which applies to the currency sixes, or at least applies to them to a greater extent than to any other class of bonds.

The amendment of the Senator from Ohio would authorize eight different amounts of circulation to be issued upon the deposit of the same amount of bonds, and each of these amounts would change every year. I do not believe that we should be justified by any existing emergency in adopting such a complicated system as this. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Vermont, it is true, applies to only one class of bonds, but it is that class which will remain outstanding for the longest period, and which represents $737,000,000 of the indebtedness.

I have detained the Senate longer than I intended, and I beg to thank Senators for their attention.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. Does the Senator from Kansas desire to speak this evening?

Mr. PLUMB. I have no special desire to do so, but I think it is best. I think the debate had better go on, so as to get rid of the matter as soon as we can.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to offer an amendment as a substitute for the bill? I want to have it printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. PLUMB. I yield to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri desire to have his proposed amendment reported?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported for information, if there be no objection.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That whenever any of the bonds of the United States become subject to redemption, and such bonds are deposited with the Treasurer of the United States as security for the circulating notes of any national banking association, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to exchange the notes hereinafter authorized to be issued for such bonds at their par value and accrued interest, or he may exchange the notes to be issued as aforesaid, at their par value, for standard gold or silver coin, and redeem said bonds therewith; and the deposit of lawful money to redeem the outstanding circulation of said banking association may be made in legal-tender notes or the notes hereinafter authorized; and thereafter the circulating notes of said bank shall be redeemed at the Treasury of the United States, and when so redeemed they shall be canceled and destroyed.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be printed and engraved Treasury notes of the United States, with such devices and descriptions as he may direct and approve, in denominations of ten, twenty, fifty, one hundred, and one thousand dollars, which shall be made payable on demand at the office of the assistant treasurer in the city of New York in standard gold or silver coin, when presented in sums of not less than $100; and said notes shall be signed by the Treasurer and countersigned by the Register of the Treasury, or their signatures thereto engraved. Said notes shall be receivable by the United States for all taxes, customs, dues, demands, and claims of the United States, and shall be received at par in all parts of the United States in payment for all salaries and other debts and demands owing by the United States to individuals, corporations, and associations within the United States, except when some other mode of payment is provided by law; and when received into the Treasury the same may be reissued. And in order to provide for the prompt redemption of the Treasury notes thus authorized to be issued the Secretary of the Treasury shall maintain a redemption fund, in standard gold and silver coin, by setting aside from accruing surplus revenues, from time to time, or from the exchange of legal-tender notes, or the Treasury notes in this section authorized, for standard gold or silver coin, such sums as with the fund now held in the Treasury for the redemption of the legal-tender notes will constitute not less than 20 per cent. of the aggregate of the outstanding legal-tender notes and of the Treasury notes hereby authorized: Provided, That the Treasury notes thus authorized to be issued in exchange and redemption of the bonds described in the first section of this act shall not exceed the amount of the note circulation of the national banking associations outstanding and secured by such bonds.

SEC. 3. That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be printed.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. I inquire of the Senator from Kansas if he will yield to a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORGAN. Before that motion is made I ask indulgence——

Mr. PLUMB. I will yield to that motion, though I am willing to go on.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to present an amendment, that it may be read and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield for another amendment to be read?

Mr. PLUMB. I will yield to have the amendment of the Senator from Alabama read. I do not care to occupy the attention of the Senate over fifteen minutes, I think, and certainly it is my disposition to have this bill go forward. I do not care to have that feeling of mine operate to prevent any other Senator having his way about the Senate adjourning.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course, if the Senator prefers to proceed now I withdraw the suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The Secretary read the following amendment proposed to be added to the bill:

SEC. —. When any bonds of the United States deposited in the Treasury by a banking association to secure its circulation are called and paid by the Government, such banking association shall have the right to substitute in the place thereof bonds issued by any of the States, and the bonds so deposited, as to their assignment, management, control, sale, or disposal, shall in all respects be subject to the laws which govern the said banking associations and the officers and agents of the United States with respect to the bonds for which said State bonds are substituted so far as the same are applicable. But said bonds of the States shall not be received as a substitute for bonds of the United States so called and paid at a rate exceeding — per cent. of their value on the face thereof. Nor shall the bonds of any State be received on deposit unless the interest theretofore accrued on the same for the period of five years previous to such deposit shall have been duly paid. Nor shall any such bonds be so received on deposit when the same are worth less than par in the city of New York.

SEC. —. The interest accruing on such State bonds, after the same are assigned and deposited in accordance with this act, shall be received by the Treasurer of the United States and placed to the credit of the banking association that has deposited the bonds, and shall be paid over to such banking association unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct that the same shall be retained in the Treasury to make good any depreciation in the value of the State bonds deposited by such banking association, or because of the failure of any banking association to provide funds as required by law to redeem its circulation, or because of its failure to pay any sum of money that may be charged to such banking association on the books of the Treasury Department.

SEC. —. At any time that the Secretary of the Treasury shall conclude that a sale of such State bonds so deposited is necessary for the security or protection of the Government of the United States in respect of the redemption of the circulation which such bonds are deposited to secure, he shall proceed to cause said bonds to be sold in the open market in New York to the highest bidder for cash, and such sale shall convey a complete title to said bonds to the purchaser. But no such sale shall be made until after thirty days from the date of a notice that the Secretary of the Treasury shall give to the banking association that has deposited such State bonds, requiring such banking association to redeem said bonds by the deposit in the Treasury of the sum of ——, lawful money of the United States, equal to so much of the circulation of such banking association as such State bonds were deposited to secure.

And if, after the sale of such bonds, any deficit remains in the sum required to redeem the circulation of any such banking association to the extent that the same is based upon and secured by such bonds, such banking association shall pay the same into the Treasury of the United States within thirty days after it has been notified of the amount of the deficit by the Secretary of the Treasury, and failing so to pay such deficit, such banking association shall forfeit its charter, and shall be put into liquidation in accordance with the laws governing the winding up of such associations.

SEC. —. The Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations for carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I yield the floor for the purpose of enabling the Senator from Tennessee to make his motion, as I understand he desires to do so.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

CAST-IRON CANNON.

Mr. LOGAN. Before that is done I wish to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to the Senate as soon as possible the number, caliber, weight, and value of all cast-iron cannon on hand condemned or unfit for use and not heretofore disposed of or appropriated.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and twenty-one minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 44 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 14, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I desire to move a change of reference of a communication from the President of the United States. On yesterday the House received a communication from the President, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Interior with reference to the boundary line between the Indian Territory and the State of Texas. That communication was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I think it should have been referred to the Committee on the Territories, because the Committee on the Territories have had the matter under consideration, and reported a bill which is now pending before the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House this communication would not go to the Committee on the Territories, though it may be proper to make that reference for the reasons assigned by the gentleman from Texas. The Chair directed its reference to the Judiciary Committee on the supposition that it related to a construction of the statutes with reference to the boundary line in question.

Mr. LANHAM. It involves only a question of fact, and provides for the establishment of a commission to be appointed by the State of Texas and the President of the United States to consider the subject.

I move, therefore, that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of this communication, and that the same be referred to the Committee on the Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

FLOODS IN THE OHIO.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have read the telegram from a leading citizen of the city of Cleveland, in my State, detailing the great distress occasioned by the prevailing floods throughout the State. I send the telegram to the Clerk's desk and ask that it may be read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I trust that the committee will promptly consider the distress now prevailing in the State and give immediate relief by reporting a resolution making additional appropriations for that purpose. It should be done at once in answer to the call of suffering.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the telegram referred to by the gentleman from Ohio will be read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The telegram is as follows:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, February 14, 1884.

Hon. WILLIAM MCKINLEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Mathematical calculations of the area of the watershed of the Ohio, fall of snow and rains, indicate that the flood will not subside to within the river banks under fifteen days. Should the rains continue it will be longer. The flood is close on to seventy-one feet and rising faster than ever—perhaps seventy-five feet will be reached, nine feet higher than ever before. Ten thousand homes ruined; no insurance, of course; probably 100,000 homeless and foodless, of the best class of our people. The Signal Service reports a cold blizzard from Dakota coming eastward. When it reaches here the loss of lives will be awful. Congress should increase appropriations to one million, and employ all the steamers possible to go up and down and rescue. Time is precious. People would contribute enough, but it takes too long, and thousands would die in the mean while.

EDWIN COWLES.

DAM AT SAINT CLOUD, MINN.

Mr. NELSON. I rise to a privileged question. Two days ago the Committee on Commerce reported back the bill (H. R. 3678) authorizing the Saint Cloud Water-Power Company to construct a dam across the Mississippi River at Saint Cloud, Minn., with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. Upon the objection of the chairman of that committee the bill was placed upon the House Calendar. I now move that it be referred back to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. That is not a privileged question; but the Chair will present it, if there be no objection.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the House Calendar and referred back to the Committee on Commerce.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BEACH. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BEACH. I wish to make a change of reference of a petition and papers which were referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The SPEAKER. That must be done through the petition-box, under the rule.

Mr. BEACH. It was a reference to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The SPEAKER. The rules provide expressly where a petition has been referred erroneously the committee itself can make the right reference through the petition-box.

Mr. BEACH. I was not aware of that.

BUILDING FOR CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY.

Mr. SINGLETON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1139) for the construction of a building for the Congressional Library, and to have it referred to the House Committee on the Library.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that should not be done out of the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the objection.

There being no further objection, the bill (S. 1139) authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I call up the contested-election case of Chalmers vs. Manning.

Mr. WELLER addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] has the floor.

Mr. WELLER. I desire the gentleman to yield to me for a moment, that I may present these soldiers' petitions which I hold in my hand.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] desires to submit a matter which he says is important. I yield to him for the report which he desires to submit if it will give rise to no debate.

FURNITURE FOR COMMITTEE-ROOMS.

Mr. COVINGTON. I am directed by the Committee on Accounts to report back the resolution which I send to the desk with the recommendation that it be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to purchase the necessary furniture and carpeting for the rooms of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, subject to the approval of the Committee on Accounts, and pay for the same out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. COVINGTON. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, having considered H. R. resolution No. —, directing the Clerk of the House to purchase the necessary furniture and carpeting for the rooms of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and pay for the same out of the contingent fund of the House, submit the following report:

The reason for asking the passage of this resolution is to give the Clerk of the House authority to pay for the furniture required to furnish the rooms assigned to these committees out of the contingent fund of the House, which is now required to be paid out of the furniture fund.

The specific appropriation for furniture is so nearly exhausted that, in the opinion of the committee, there may not be sufficient left to furnish these rooms and meet other necessary contingent expenses, but there is a sufficient amount in the contingent fund for this purpose.

When the appropriation for furniture was made the furnishing of additional committee-rooms was not considered, and consequently no estimates for that purpose were made. The furnishing of these rooms is a matter of necessity, and therefore the committee recommend that the resolution do pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. When this subject was before the House on a former occasion and these changes were proposed to be made it was stated the expense would probably reach $200. I infer from this resolution and report that considerable expense is to be involved, and I trust the gentleman from Maryland the chairman of the Committee on Accounts will state to the House what portion of the contingent fund is made available by this resolution.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I can not yield now for debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust there will be an answer to this question. This is a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The report is now before the House for consideration.

Mr. COVINGTON. I do not want to take advantage of the kindness of the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can withdraw the report if he chooses.

Mr. COVINGTON. I can give the explanation in a moment. The furniture fund, as it is technically called, is, I am informed, nearly exhausted. This resolution simply turns over a part of the contingent fund of the House to supplying furniture for the two committee-rooms named. When the furniture fund was created these committees were not separated from the standing committees of the House.

The sum of $10,000 was appropriated as a distinct furniture fund. That fund, I am told, upon a reliable authority, is nearly exhausted. I think it is down to some $1,400. The object now is to allow these two rooms to be furnished out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman will state the amount that will probably be involved.

Mr. COVINGTON. The purchases have not been made; I am not able to state the amount, because I have not been informed by the Clerk of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution reported by the committee.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. COVINGTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EARNINGS OF UNITED STATES MARSHALS, ETC.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House of Representatives adopted January 16, 1884, a statement showing the gross earnings per annum of United States marshals, attorneys, and clerks, and the expenses of their offices, and the net earnings which have been paid to them each year from the beginning of the fiscal year 1873 to the close of the fiscal year 1883; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, and ordered to be printed.

CONTESTED ELECTION—CHALMERS VS. MANNING.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia calls up as the regular order the unfinished business, which is the consideration of the report of the Committee on Elections on the contested-election case of J. R. Chalmers vs. Van H. Manning from the second Congressional district of Mississippi. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] is entitled to the floor for fifteen minutes.

Mr. BELFORD. During the years I have spent in this House I have noticed that political contests for seats in this Chamber are generally settled on purely partisan considerations. The Republican party has committed a number of unblushing outrages [laughter on the Democratic side], equaled only by the outrages committed by the Democratic party. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

I stand here to-day to speak in the interest of political morality and political decency. It is time that the honest and honorable men on both sides of this Chamber viewed these election cases on the basis that an upright and honest judge would determine a controversy pending before him in court.

I assert it to be a fact, and I challenge contradiction, that on two occasions the Democratic party by brute force and political power seated General Chalmers in this House when he was not elected to a seat here; and now they practically refuse to seat him when he has been elected to this House. Is not that a fact?

Let us look at the state of affairs that we have before us. I hold in my hand a document the truth and authenticity of which no gentleman will question. It is over the signature of General Manning himself. In it I find these words.

I admit that the inspectors and clerks of the several election precincts did certify to the county commissioners of elections in their respective counties that you received a majority of the votes cast; and I further admit that the 1,472 votes which the commissioners of Tate County returned as cast for J. R. Chambless were in fact cast for you, and that the name Chambless was inserted in the return by clerical error instead of your name.

There is the declaration made by General Manning himself, that he did not receive a majority of the votes cast in that district, and that whatever confusion attached to the papers in the office of the secretary of state of Mississippi grew out of some clerical misprision or some blunder of some incompetent man. Yet in view of this open declaration made by General Manning himself that he was defeated in that election, it is claimed that he shall now be allowed to associate upon the floor of this House with men who have been legitimately and honestly elected.

But this is not all. Let me call attention to a telegram that General Manning sent to Mr. Fuller, 282 New Jersey avenue, Washington, D. C.:

Defeated. Leave 15th. Am well. Wrote Martin to-day.

In every instance this man confesses himself that he never received a majority of the votes cast in that district and that he is not entitled to a seat upon this floor. Then there is a telegraphic dispatch from Mr. Watson, who was chairman of the Congressional committee, to this effect:

Manning defeated. Returns from Tippah and Union 500 less.

Now I appeal to the honesty and to the justice of members on both sides of the House, and ask them if they can seat a man upon this floor, either on a prima facie or a final case, when he himself admits that he was overwhelmingly defeated and that he has not been selected to represent the constituents in his district? Is that the part of political morality or the part of political decency?

Yesterday I had the honor to ask my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] a question. I said to him, "Suppose that a man has a certificate of election signed by the governor of his State, and that man comes into this House and in the presence of this American council declares that that certificate is fraudulent, that he was not elected and was not entitled to hold the seat, are we to swear in a man of that kind even on a prima facie case?"

I can best illustrate the position occupied by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] by relating an anecdote which I heard told the other day about a sick Irishman. The Irishman was exceedingly sick, and of course very much disgruntled in his temper. He went home, and his wife desired to administer some medicine to him. The Irishman immediately began to pound her head, and break up the furniture, and to have a regular jamboree in the parlor. [Laughter.]

The wife concluded that she would send for the doctor. The doctor came and diagnosed the case. "Now," said the doctor, "Betty, the best thing to do for Pat is to make up a nice whisky toddy three times a day and give it to him." "Oh!" said she, "I can not give Pat that medicine, doctor; if I do, he will beat me and break up the furniture."

Pat was lying in the next room pretending to be asleep. As the doctor was hurrying out of the house Pat whispered, in a feeble voice, "Doctor, doctor, come back and tell Betty that if I refuse to take the toddy she must make me take it." [Great laughter.] And that is the exact position occupied by Betty Curtin of Pennsylvania and Betty Dorsheimer of New York. [Great laughter.]

Mr. Manning has not had the courage to appear before this House and assert his right to this seat. If he regarded this certificate as a valid certificate, as a certificate that should be recognized by honorable men, why did he not submit it to the Clerk as you, Mr. Speaker, submitted your certificate and as I submitted mine, and have his name go upon the roll? He was too much of a man absolutely to commit himself to a certificate of that character obtained through the blunders of a county clerk and possibly the fraud of the secretary of state of his State.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] yesterday said: "What are you going to do with the law?" I say that the law is determined by the fact; the law hinges on and covers the fact. When the fact exists, according to the confession of this party, that he was not elected to this House, I say that the law says he shall not hold a seat here either on a prima facie or a conclusive case.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] said yesterday that he had been in court when the judge refused to allow a party to enter the plea of guilty. So have I been in court when the judge refused to allow a murderer to enter a plea of guilty; but I can tell the gentleman why he refused to do so. It was because of a statute on the statute-book which, in order to allow the judge to pass the death sentence, required a jury to find that the person had committed the murder with premeditation and deliberation, and to accept the plea of guilty would be to slip his neck out of the noose. That is the whole theory of the argument offered by the gentleman from New York, and I will wager my reputation that no such case ever occurred as he states unless under the exceptional circumstances to which I have referred.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk and desire to have read an editorial from a leading Democratic paper in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Give us the name of the paper.

Mr. BELFORD. It is an orthodox Democratic paper.

Mr. SINGLETON. Give us the name.

Mr. BELFORD. The New Mississippian.

Mr. SINGLETON. As big as a thumb-paper.

Mr. BELFORD. As big as your party's conscience.

Mr. SINGLETON. Nobody ever accused yours of having a conscience.

The Clerk read as follows:

No paper in this State has fought that political recalcitrant J. R. Chalmers harder than has the New Mississippian. But the devil should have his dues. Manning is no more entitled to a seat in Congress on that false and fraudulent certificate manufactured in the secretary of state's office than the Khédive of Egypt.

If the Democracy of the second district were really bulldozed by the few little pitiful United States marshals and inspectors to such an extent that they were afraid to vote for Manning, or if it can be proven that Chalmers's election was procured by the Hubbell corruption fund, then if this be proved and admitted, Chalmers should not be allowed the seat.

But to seat Manning on that "fly-blowed" certificate, based upon the throwing out of Chalmers's Tate County vote, thereby disfranchising some fifteen hundred electors, would be an outrage which we don't believe the Democratic majority in Congress capable of perpetrating. Nine-tenths of the Democratic press of the State denounced the infamy at the time, and the people, the honest, toiling masses, are a unit in their condemnation of it now.

If Major BARKSDALE, our immediate Representative in Congress, and his colleagues will respect the wishes of their constituents, they will, as soon as the case comes into the House, defend the fair name of Mississippi by repudiating on behalf of the people of this Commonwealth that "fly-blowed" certificate and the manner of its issuance.

They should lose no time in repelling the charge that the Democracy of Mississippi, the great masses of the people, uphold the shameful act of the "certificate-makers."

Mr. BELFORD. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the language of a Democratic paper. My friend from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] says it is a small paper; but does not the Vicksburg Herald, a paper of national reputation, occupy the same ground on this subject? Have the people of Mississippi become so debased that they desire to force upon this House a man who publicly confesses that he never received a majority of the votes in the district he claims to represent?

Mr. SINGLETON. At a proper time I hope to respond to the gentleman.

Mr. BELFORD. All right.

Gentlemen who favor the immediate admission of Mr. Manning upon the certificate say practically that he was out of his head when he made this confession. Oh, no; it is not Mr. Manning who was out of his head; it is you Democratic gentlemen who are willing to add to your list of political outrages another one that ought to shock the conscience of every man within the limits of this Republic. I say the time has come when the honest men of both parties should arrest these political outrages; when honest men of both parties should declare that a man who has not been legally elected to a seat on this floor shall not occupy it.

But we were told yesterday by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] that notwithstanding these facts, this man should be sworn in because he has the certificate. But let me call that gentleman's attention to one thing that occurred in the Forty-fourth Congress and one that occurred in the Forty-fifth Congress. In the Forty-fourth Congress I came to this House bringing in my hands a certificate under the broad seal of the State of Colorado, which, although not as populous as Pennsylvania, wears a diamond as bright as any in the coronet of the nation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BELFORD. I ask for just a minute more.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Very well.

Mr. BELFORD. I say that in the Forty-fourth Congress I came here with an uncontested certificate; and yet, on motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], that certificate was referred to a committee, and for two months of that short session I was compelled to cool my shins in the corridors of the Capitol. [Laughter.] That certificate was just as good as the certificate held by any member of that House. There was nobody contesting my seat, nobody objecting, but the political wet-nurse of Illinois, distinguished by his partisan zealotry for objects that I will not state, kept me battening on the moor while he was feeding on the Congressional cabbage himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. PETTIBONE. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. RAY].

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, three propositions are now before the House in relation to this contested-election case from the second Mississippi district. The first is found in the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections, which concludes with a resolution declaring that neither of the two claimants, Messrs. Chalmers and Manning, should be seated as a member of this body until the case is determined upon its merits. The second proposition comes from the minority of the committee, which holds substantially that inasmuch as Mr. Manning has obtained possession of the credentials, he is, for this reason alone, entitled to admission forthwith as a member of the House. The third proposition is the resolution offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN], which provides that the whole matter be recommitted to the Committee on Elections with instructions to find out and report to the House whether or not a certificate of election has been issued to anybody, and if so, to whom.

I will discuss these propositions briefly, reversing the order in which they have been mentioned.

1. Taking up first, then, the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and which seems to be favored by some of those who oppose the majority report, allow me to say, Mr. Speaker, that I can not comprehend the utility or sense of this resolution. Ever since the day this House organized the credentials of Mr. Manning have been before us. This House referred them, "and all other papers in the contested-election case of J. R. Chalmers vs. Van H. Manning," to the appropriate committee; and every member who has paid the slightest attention to our proceedings knows at this moment just as well as he can ever know to whom the credentials were issued. Both the majority and the minority reports state the fact explicitly that the certificate of election was given to Mr. Manning by the State authorities of Mississippi. It may be just at this time in the hands of the Committee on Elections, but it was delivered to Mr. Manning, and he has really held the document ever since it was issued by the governor of Mississippi. This is conceded by everybody.

Then, why do we want to pass such a resolution, when the House is already in possession of every fact the resolution calls for?

2. The minority of the committee maintain that Mr. Manning ought to be admitted to a seat here because he has got possession of these credentials merely, and that we should shut our eyes to every other fact appearing in the case, and determine the contest by looking at his credentials alone. We are told that they are signed by the governor and are under the great seal of the sovereign State of Mississippi.

Very good; what of it? If covered all over with State seals and signed by a dozen State officials, such credentials are never more than prima facie evidence, liable to be rebutted and contradicted, and statements of fact contained therein ought always to be disregarded when shown or admitted to be false. Official seals and signatures are of no force or value to sustain an apparent or conceded falsehood. The honorable gentlemen who oppose the adoption of the majority report strangely ignore all the evidence referred to the committee except the single item of credentials, which never make anything stronger than a prima facie case.

I deny, Mr. Speaker, that Manning's credentials have been before the House or before the Committee on Elections in any such sense as to entitle that gentleman to be sworn in as upon a prima facie case or otherwise. How did they come before the House and before the committee?

Let the RECORD answer. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] declared on the first day of the session that—

> For reasons which were satisfactory to Mr. Manning he chose not to present that certificate until some action had been taken on the part of the House. This morning I called upon the attorney of Mr. Manning and asked permission to present his credentials to the House for such action as the House might see proper to take in relation to that vacancy.

So it appears that these credentials were borrowed and presented, with the idea that this House would take some favorable action in the case in the absence of Mr. Manning, and without any request on his part that such action should be had.

Again, Mr. Speaker, on the second day of the session the same gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] declared that he was requested by Mr. Manning to ask the "consent of the House that the question of his prima facie right to a seat on this floor be referred to the standing Committee on Elections when appointed, with instructions to report thereon at the earliest day possible." And on the suggestion of his colleague [Mr. KEIFER], and by common consent, the case of Mr. Chalmers was also referred to the same committee, and finally a resolution was adopted, no one objecting, "that the certificate and all other papers in the contested-election case of J. R. Chalmers vs. Van H. Manning, from the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi, be referred to the Committee on Elections when appointed, with instructions to report immediately whether upon the prima facie case as presented by said papers said Manning or Chalmers is entitled to be sworn in as a member pending a contest on the merits, and not to affect the final right to said seat."

Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of the adoption of this resolution, how can it be fairly argued that the duty of the committee was limited to the consideration of one of the papers submitted, namely, Mr. Manning's credentials· and that all the other papers referred to them should be entirely ignored? One might contend with equal reason and propriety that Mr. Manning's credentials should be excluded from their consideration, and only the Chalmers documents examined. The truth is, as stated by the majority, that the case is without precedent; that Manning's admissions and his refusal to present his commission and take his seat in the usnal way are unparalleled in the annals of Congress. Referring to that part of the record containing Mr. Manning's answer to the contest filed by Chalmers, he says:

> I admit that the inspectors and clerks of the several election precincts did certify to the county commissioners of election in their respective counties that you received a majority of the votes cast, and I further admit that the 1,472 votes which the commissioners of Tate County returned as cast for J. R. Chambless were in fact cast for you, and that the name Chambless was inserted in the return by a clerical error instead of your name; and in this connection I state that because of said error to your prejudice I will not take a seat in said Congress or ask the Clerk to enroll my name as a member thereof until I have vindicated and the House shall have affirmed my right thereto.

Why should we close our eyes to all the other evidence introduced before the House, and which is in the possession of the House, in regard to the status of this contest, and look only to what is offered on one side and to a single item contained in that offer?

I deny the propriety of such action by the House, and especially under the peculiar circumstances of the case before us. The majority of the committee, and I believe the majority of those who have addressed the House on both sides of this question, have conceded the rule to be that the holder of a certificate of election, in due form, coming here before the House is organized and filing that certificate with the Clerk pursuant to the law, or if after the House is organized he presents his certificate to the House and claims his seat in open session, either course is ordinarily held to be sufficient prima facie to give the party a right to a seat.

Or, in other words, to use the expression of my friend from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS], such certificate is prima facie evidence merely of his election. This rule governs the credentials of all the members of this body. There may have been exceptions to it occasionally, but as a general thing I believe the rule as stated has commonly obtained.

Why, then, should not the resolution reported by the minority inviting Mr. Manning to be sworn and seated as a member of the House pending the contest be adopted? The answer is plain and clear, namely, because he has declined to do so. He has refused to come here and present his certificate of election and claim his seat in the ordinary way. Should the House engage in this kind of tomfoolery, I was about to say, of sending out a letter of invitation to somebody who is supposed to have a certificate of election in his possession written on gilt-edged and tinted paper, humbly begging him to come in and join this body?

Ought this House to engage a band of music and send it out at the head of a select or standing committee, with instructions to escort some gentleman into this Hall, supposed and believed to have credentials for a seat, but who declines to present them himself in order that some Congressional district may not go unrepresented for a few weeks on this floor? [Laughter.] No, sir; such a course would be absurd and unprecedented. Men having confidence in their own claims to seats and membership here will not fail to present their certificates in the usual way as other members are required to do according to law and precedent. Every member should be required to present his certificate if practicable as a guarantee of good faith in the claim he makes.

Everybody knows, Mr. Speaker, the reason why Mr. Manning has neglected to file his certificate, or rather why he has refused to file it. In his answer to Chalmers's contest, which is a part of the record of the case, he admits in substance that he did not receive a majority of the votes actually cast, counted, and returned in the second district of Mississippi. The effect of that admission is to force the conclusion upon our minds that the governor and secretary of the State of Mississippi gave the certificate to the wrong person, and that instead of Manning being entitled to it Chalmers ought to have received it. The credentials ought never to have been given to or received by Mr. Manning, because he was not elected. And for this reason it is apparent that he has refrained from presenting his certificate, which is impeached by the other evidence and ought to be disregarded until upon a contest he shall vindicate his right. No one, after making such an admission, could reasonably claim prima facie membership in this body. Manning should be remitted to his contest upon the merits, and when he has established his right to a seat upon the merits of his case, then, and not till then, should the House admit him.

I think, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the error of the minority of the committee is that they only take a narrow, partial, and technical view of what has been submitted to the House and by the House referred to the Committee on Elections. All the papers presented and filed with the Clerk in relation to this contested-election case were referred to that committee, and they were required to investigate the matter and report whether Chalmers or Manning had the prima facie right to occupy the seat during the pendency of the contest on the merits.

3. This brings me to the report of the majority of the committee, which is that neither of these parties is entitled prima facie to the seat. It is quite probable, Mr. Speaker, this is the more correct and strictly legal view of the situation. But it seems to me when the House is in possession of all the facts, and when by the admission of Mr. Manning substantially that he holds the certificate on account of an error in the computation or footing up of the returns filed in the office of the secretary of the State of Mississippi, when we have before us the means of correcting that error and uncontradicted evidence showing that Mr. Chalmers was elected by several hundred majority, I say it does seem to me quite clear this House should at once proceed to seat Mr. Chalmers, and that, beyond question, on the proofs he has the right, prima facie, to hold the seat as a Representative from the second district of Mississippi instead of Mr. Manning, whose right to hold the certificate depends entirely upon the admitted error in footing up the votes cast in Tate County.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PETTIBONE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG].

Mr. LONG. Mr. Speaker, five minutes is perhaps as much time as I can profitably use. As I understand this case, if Mr. Manning, having the regular certificate of the governor of his State, had presented it to the Clerk of this House before its organization, then, under the law and the well-established precedents, he would have been entitled to have had his name placed by the Clerk upon the roll-call. That is provided for in the act of Congress. But for the establishment and faithful observance of that principle we should indeed be involved in the inextricable confusion to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] alluded yesterday, and reduced to that chaos of which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] expressed so much fear. But it must not be forgotton, for it is the key to this situation, that Mr. Manning, either from conscience or delicacy or because he preferred the House to do what he declined to do himself, did not present his certificate until after the House had organized.

Therefore we are in no danger at this time of establishing a precedent which will endanger hereafter the organization of this House. When Mr. Manning presented his certificate through the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] we were at a different stage of the proceedings, and the question was a different one from what would have been the case had he presented it before the organization. Other facts had come in. Of these the first is that he did not present his certificate until after the organization of the House. The second is that by this very delay in presenting his certificate he raised a suspicion with regard to his title to a seat. And the third fact, which appeared at the time, is that he had in writing admitted his title to be questionable—so questionable, indeed, that he would not occupy a seat upon this floor until his right to it was vindicated; not his prima facie right, but his right pure and absolute.

With regard to that admission it has been very gravely argued here that such an admission can not so far estop him as to deprive his constituents, his district, this House, this country, of his occupation of a seat as a Representative. But why argue that, when everybody admits it? That is not the significance of Mr. Manning's admission. The significance of his admission is that it is simply a piece of testimony going to show that he is not entitled to a seat. It is a part of the evidence, and it is the best evidence, because it comes from the man who is personally most interested and best informed upon the question involved.

What, then, did we refer to the committee? We referred to the committee, under the resolution introduced at the time, the "certificate and all other papers in the contested-election case." It has been suggested that the committee have gone beyond their authority in their report because they did not confine themselves to the certificate of the governor. If that were the only thing that had been referred to them, then in making this report they would have gone beyond the basis of their authority; then the minority might claim, as they do, that under the ordinary rule and by an unbroken chain of precedents we have generally no right to go in preliminary organization behind the certificate of the governor. But we referred to the committee not the certificate of the governor only; we expressly added "all other papers," and our instruction to that committee was to determine, not upon prima facie evidence, as somebody has said, but upon the prima facie case embracing the governor's certificate and "all other papers" referred, whether Mr. Chalmers or Mr. Manning was entitled to be sworn in pending the contest on the merits. There is nothing in the report which upon a careful examination shows that they have gone one whit beyond the authority and papers referred to them.

What is the prima facie case? I do not believe in construing this term with technical narrowness. We are a great body, organized under the Constitution and empowered by the Constitution to determine the question of the rights of claimants to seats upon this floor. We are not to give a technical construction to such terms when to do so is to work manifest and patent injustice. But what is the prima facie case? I understand by it a case which shows in whose favor the presumption of title is. In other and plainer speech, who appears, so far as we have gone and so far as we are informed, to have the best title? When I am asked to determine who has the prima facie title, I am asked to determine who, upon the facts so far as they appear and so far as we have gone, is entitled to the seat. That was the function which the House devolved upon the committee. Fulfilling that function, the committee have made their report. They have reported back that they had considered not merely the governor's certificate. If that had been the only thing referred, its reference would have been ridiculous, because the House could have decided for itself that question. If that had been the only question, it was already settled by every precedent. No, they very properly reported back also "the other facts;" and in their report they are careful to indicate that every exhibit relied on and considered by them is a paper referred to them by the House, so careful are they not to go beyond the authority conferred on them in this preliminary case. And by their report it appears that Manning, so far as we have gone, prima facie is not entitled to be sworn in.

And yet we are gravely asked by gentlemen to shut our eyes and our ears to half a dozen most essential and important facts which are actually in this case, and to open our eyes and our ears to only one fact, the governor's certificate. Such a proposition, though not of course intended as an insult to our intelligence and to our honesty, yet comes very near it. A further investigation "on the merits" may show a title in Mr. Manning. At this moment, however, the papers which made up the record when it was referred on the first day of this session to the committee, and which they have now reported back, show as clear as daylight that Mr. Manning so far has not the shadow of a title. I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to stultify myself by voting in direct violation of half a dozen most essential and controlling facts which thus far have been found in this case, simply on the poor technical ground that if I had known but one of those facts, to wit, the governor's certificate, I should have voted otherwise. That stage of the governor's certificate is a stage which we left months ago. To go back to that alone, willfully ignoring the other elements which we have ourselves recognized as in the case and as referred to the committee and which are now before us, would be to resign our common sense and to shirk our duty.

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendments joint resolution (H. Res. 152) for the relief of E. H. George and H. W. Walker.

Also, that the Senate had passed a bill (S. 410) for the relief of the Sone & Fleming Manufacturing Company, limited in the city of New York; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—CHALMERS VS. MANNING.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has four minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Mr. Speaker, I only intend to occupy the brief time that remains to me. On yesterday it was stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the great war governor in the times that tried men's souls, Governor CURTIN, that he offered a resolution which he desired to be considered now in reference to this case. What was that resolution? It is as follows:

Resolved, That the question of a prima facie right to a seat on this floor involved in the contested-election case of James R. Chalmers vs. Van H. Manning, from the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi, be recommitted to the Committee on Elections with instructions to ascertain and report immediately to this House whether a certificate of election to the office of Representative from said district to the Forty-eighth Congress was issued by the proper authority, as required by the laws of the State of Mississippi and of the United States, to any one; and if so, to whom.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I find further on in the debate on yesterday that Mr. CURTIN himself stated, and I challenge his attention to what I will now read:

On the first day of the session an effort was made to seat Mr. Manning on prima facie evidence that he had a right to a seat here; on precisely the evidence on which every other gentleman on this floor occupies a seat.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the world knows, the whole United States knows, every man upon this floor knows, that Manning had a certificate from the governor of Mississippi. Why send back that question to the Committee on Elections when every one of you knows that he has got that certificate? And not only that, Governor CURTIN has notified this House that he knows and that we all know that Manning has that certificate.

Mr. Speaker, if that is the only question, why not honestly and manfully come right up here and say the American Congress knows that Manning has the certificate, and therefore we will vote him in? I expect you will do it. So far as I am concerned, as I said on yesterday, I do not care a baubee if you do do it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COOK rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa rise to oppose or favor the report?

Mr. COOK. I rise to oppose the report.

I feel very much embarrassed by the fact that in rising to occupy my hour in this debate I find I have promised to yield to various members on the floor who are anxious to speak during my time. I confess I have promised more than I have, and I must ask some of them to pardon me if I am unable to yield to them what I have promised; but I shall attempt to yield the time in the order in which I have promised it. I yield now twenty minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY].

Mr. CLARDY. I do not agree with gentlemen who have addressed the House in behalf of the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections, that Mr. Manning's answer contains any statement inconsistent with the claim he has preferred to a seat in this body pending the contest and until a decision can be had on the merits. In his notice of contest Mr. Chalmers not only denies the election of Mr. Manning, but he challenges the validity and regularity of the certificate held by him and alleges that he, Chalmers, has filed with the Clerk of the House certificates showing his election and his prima facie right to a seat in this Congress. I quote his language:

I charge—

First. That the pretended credentials you hold are illegal and void because not such credentials as are authorized by the laws of Mississippi.

Second. That the certificates which I have filed with the Clerk of the House from the secretary of state of Mississippi show that I have the prima facie right to said seat.

Mr. Manning in his answer specifically denies these allegations. He affirms the validity of the certificate which was issued to him. He admits that 1,472 votes returned by the commissioners of Tate County as cast for J. R. Chambless were in truth and in fact cast for the contestant, and then he proceeds to state facts showing his own election notwithstanding this addition to Chalmers's vote.

And then, with his election denied and the regularity of his certificate denied, he concludes his answer by saying that he will not take his seat in this Congress until he has vindicated and the House has affirmed his title thereto.

I fail to understand, Mr. Speaker, why a submission of the question in issue to that tribunal which under the Constitution is the judge of the election, the qualifications, and the returns of its own members should injuriously affect Mr. Manning. This he has done and no more. Suppose there is a statement in his answer or that there is some act of Mr. Manning which is susceptible of the construction placed upon it by gentlemen, will that justify this House in disregarding the law and in denying to the people of the second Congressional district of Mississippi the right of representation on this floor?

But, Mr. Speaker, I deny that Mr. Manning has the power by admissions or statements in his answer or by any conduct of his to preclude this House from the expression of its own judgment as to the force and regularity of the certificate held by him. And I deny that any act of his subsequent to his election not amounting to a disqualification and short of a voluntary resignation of the office can estop him from the assertion of title to it.

One gentleman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DAVIS], yesterday spoke about an office as though it were private property; he said the certificate conferred upon Manning an individual right, a right that neither the governor of Mississippi nor the State of Mississippi itself could take from him; and that there was only one person who could destroy its effect, and that was Van H. Manning. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is not private property, this office of Representative in Congress. It is an office in which the public, the people, have an interest; and the idea of invoking the doctrine of estoppel in this case seems to me to bear absurdity upon its face.

Allow me to read upon that point one section from McCrary's work on the American Law of Elections, and it will at once destroy all the argument that has been made by gentlemen on the other side to the effect that Manning has admitted away his own case since the institution of the election contest. I read from section 359:

In the case just cited it was further held that the rule that a failure to answer is a confession of the allegations contained in the complaint will not be applied to a contested election in the House of Representatives. The reason is that the inquiry is of a public nature, and not a case involving private rights alone. If the contestant and the sitting member were the only parties interested in the representation of this district it might not be unfair to hold that the sitting member upon service of notice upon him according to law must answer as the law requires, or, by neglect or refusal, be taken as confessing the truth of the allegations made in conformity with law against his right to his seat and abide the judgment of the House upon said confession. But the contestant and the sitting member are by no means the only parties interested in this representation. The electors of the district, each and every one of them, have a vital interest in that question, and no one of them can be precluded by any laches not his own from insisting that the choice of the majority shall be regarded. No confession of the sitting member, however it may bind him personally, can place the contestant in the seat unless he is the choice of the majority, nor deprive that majority of its rightful representation.

In view of this authority it strikes me as being most absurd to say that because Mr. Manning did not appear in front of the Speaker's desk and take the oath on the first day of the present session of Congress or has not done so since, but has caused his certificate to be referred to a committee of this House, he is estopped from the assertion of title to the office, and the people of his district are deprived of a voice in the law-making department of the Government.

I was surprised at the position taken by my friend the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG]. I recognize his ability as a lawyer; but I can not understand why, if that certificate was valid at the time it was issued, it becomes invalid because of the failure to present it to the Clerk of this House. A man can not hold an office and refuse to discharge the duties of that office. That is the law as laid down in the books. And he can not be deprived of his office unless he becomes disqualified to hold it.

There are only two methods pointed out by McCrary and the other law-writers upon the subject by which there can be a divestiture of title to office. One of these is by the voluntary resignation of the office, and the other is by disqualification occurring subsequent to the election, such as, for instance, a removal from the State, county, or district to which the officer is restricted by the law of his office, or by accepting an incompatible office, or by the relinquishment of any express qualification, &c.

Having shown, as I think, that no statement or act of Mr. Manning's can invalidate his certificate or affect his title to the office of Representative (and here I desire to again say that in my judgment Mr. Manning has made no admission nor performed any act which indicates a resolution on his part not to avail himself of the rights which the certificate confers), what is left of this case? Nothing but the papers presented by Mr. Chalmers and the certificate of election issued to Mr. Manning.

The gentleman from my own State [Mr. DAVIS] said yesterday that he was not prepared to vote to give Mr. Chalmers a seat on this floor, because the papers which had been filed by him were not sufficient evidence that he had received the 1,472 votes claimed for him in Tate County. What other evidence is there that looks to the discrediting of Manning's title? Taking away what some gentlemen call the admissions of Mr. Manning, on which so much stress has been placed and which I have shown can not be considered, what other evidence is there than the papers filed by Mr. Chalmers, which a member of the committee says do not evidence his title, because, as he says, he has not the credentials and the certificate of Tate County is susceptible of different constructions. That is, it does not show that 1,472 votes were cast in Tate County for Mr. Chalmers.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], as other gentlemen have done before him, argued that because there was a reference by the House of certain papers to the Committee of Elections, therefore it was the duty of the committee to consider all such papers, not rejecting any; in other words, that the House declared that the certificate of election and the papers submitted by Mr. Chalmers were competent testimony, and should all be considered by the committee in determining the prima facie right to the office. Now, I submit that if the House passed upon the competency of all the papers referred and declared them evidence, there was no occasion for the interposition of the Committee on Elections, but the House then and there could have passed upon the weight of the evidence and awarded the seat in controversy either to Mr. Manning or to Mr. Chalmers.

But if the gentleman will look at the case referred to yesterday by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER], the case of Clark against Giddings, he will see that in that case the certificate was also accompanied by papers showing the election of Giddings by a majority of seven hundred and thirty votes. Yet that Committee of Elections, presided over by Mr. McCrary, the author of the American Law of Elections, and now holding an important judicial position in the country, and numbering among its members Mr. HOAR, now a Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. HALE, now a Senator from Maine, and MI. POLAND, of Vermont, then as now a distinguished member of this House, held that nothing was competent or proper to be considered by them at that time but the certificate of election itself, and the House affirmed the judgment of the committee.

The only question about which there was any contention, either in the committee or in the House, was as to the force and effect of the certificate, which, it was insisted upon the part of those who believed that Mr. Giddings was entitled to the seat, showed upon its face the infirmity of Mr. Clark's title.

I do not know whether my friend from New York read it yesterday or not, but I believe he did. After certifying to the election of Clark the governor further certifies that he rejected certain returns, and that in his opinion, owing to fraud and irregularities in the conduct of the election, no certificate of election should be issued.

Now, what authorities can gentlemen favoring the majority report cite in support of the position they take, that a certificate bearing the great seal of a sovereign State and commissioning one of her citizens to represent her people in the National Legislature is no greater or higher proof of the right to enter upon and discharge the duties of the office of Representative in Congress than ex parte affidavits and loose papers which have been referred to them? The two cases to which reference has been made and upon which the committee seem to rely—Chilcott vs. Hunt and the New Jersey case—have both been overruled and their doctrines repudiated by this House. Unless we ignore the law we must pass the resolution offered by Mr. CURTIN. We can not adopt the committee's report without doing violence to the rights of the people of Mississippi and the rights of the honorable gentleman [Mr. Manning] who comes here as their Representative. His certificate is regular upon its face; it has been issued by the officer authorized by the law of Mississippi to issue it, we are informed by the committee; and I say, therefore, that it imparts absolute verity and is conclusive of the right of Mr. Manning to occupy a seat in this House until the determination of the election contest.

Mr. COOK. I have observed during this debate one universal error, which seems to enter into the argument of every gentleman who has arisen to speak in support of the report of the majority of the committee. They do not distinguish between judging of the return of a member and judging of his election.

The Constitution provides that this House shall be the judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its members. I insist that there is a broad distinction between judging of the returns of members and judging of their election. It is as important that we observe the true rule, observe a uniform rule, in judging of the one as in judging of the other, under the resolution referring to us the question of the prima facie right.

I have not examined this case upon its merits. I have purposely abstained from looking into the evidence in the case, at least to any great degree, although as a member of the Committee on Elections I have had it before me for some days. When I come to cast my vote in committee and upon this floor upon the question of who ought to have been returned, I shall look into the testimony. I consider that I am now called upon, in the House as in the committee, simply to determine the question of who was returned from that district. This House is originally made up of members returned to it, regardless of whether they were elected or not.

I have no feeling in this case as between the parties to it, no preference one way or the other. I have no ambition to have my views or the views of those of the committee with whom I agree accepted by the House. All I want is simply to call the attention of the House to what I consider is now the duty of every member in voting upon the question before us, and the only question which was submitted and ought to have been submitted to the Committee on Elections; that is, who has been returned from this district?

It is a fundamental rule of parliamentary law that the member who has been returned is a member of the House until the House shall have decided that he was not elected.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. COOK. I have but little time.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Just a question.

Mr. COOK. Very well.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Does not that word "return" lose its force after the organization of the House and when the matter is referred to a committee? Does not the matter of return relate to the existence of the prima facie case and the prima facie case only?

Mr. COOK. I understand the point, and I answer that it does not. A member returned here to the House is as much a returned member after the House has been organized as he was before. You have in this very Congress an instance arising after the organization of the House. I refer to the case of a gentleman returned from North Carolina. In that case upon this side of the House you established and voted for the precedent that he should be sworn in, regardless of the question whether he had been elected in the proper district or not. You determined that he should be sworn in upon his return. Vacancies occur during the session, and members are elected to fill such vacancies. They do not come in here under any different rule from members who were elected before the organization of the House.

Sir, a man returned as a member of this House is as much a member from the 4th day of March and before the organization of the House as he is afterward. He is as much a member of this body, de facto, before as after the organization.

One further remark upon this point. There is a universal rule established and adhered to since this House has been known, that every man who holds credentials and is duly returned as a member is entitled to occupy his seat regardless of whether he should have been returned or not. Mr. Cushing, in his work on the Law and Practice in Legislative Assemblies, section 235–240, says:

The principles of parliamentary law applicable to the question are perfectly simple and plain, founded on the very nature of things, established by the uniform practice and authority of Parliament, and confirmed by reason and analogy. These principles are as follows:

1. That every person duly returned is a member, whether legally elected or not, until his election is set aside.

2. That no person who is not duly returned is a member, even though legally elected, until his election is duly established.

McCrary, in his American Law of Elections, says:

These considerations have made it necessary to adopt and adhere to the rule that a person holding the ordinary credentials shall be qualified and allowed to act pending a contest and until a decision can be had upon the merits. * * * The person duly commissioned must exercise the functions of the office until upon an investigation upon the merits it is judicially determined otherwise.

And again in section 216 he says:

It is to be observed in this connection that while in determining a prima facie right to a seat the House of Representatives will not look behind the certificate, if it should be signed by the proper officers, and if it contains a statement in unequivocal terms of the result of the election.

No instance can be found since the adoption of the Constitution except in the Chilcott vs. Hunt case; which did not relate to a Representative but merely to a Delegate from a Territory. In that case, from the statements of gentlemen now on the floor who were then members, I learn that the House then, as is now threatened, disregarded all rules and precedents, because members departed from the question properly before them, left the question of the prima facie right for the right upon the merits. I can best answer that case by quoting from the Congressional debates on the case of Clark vs. Giddings, from Texas. I read what Judge McCrary, then chairman of the Committee on Elections—and on all hands conceded to be the highest authority on the law of elections—said in that case:

There is one rule which has governed the House in all cases of this kind, which has never been departed from except in one single instance, and I believe no gentleman on this floor will undertake to justify the departure from the rule in that instance. That rule is this, that whoever presents to this House such credentials as are provided for by the law of the State is entitled prima facie to a seat in the House and should be sworn in pending any contest which there may be with regard to the merits of the case. The rule was overborne in one instance; but, as I have said, nobody will undertake to justify the action of the House in that case. In every other case the rule has been adhered to, and I trust it will be adhered to in this case. We can not safely depart from a rule so essential to the organization of this House; on which depends, in fact, the organization of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I have on this question simply been governed by the law as I find it, believing that a departure from it would lead to confusion and chaos, and I urge this House to decide this case upon this well-settled principle, not because of the effect it may have in this instance, not because it may satisfy newspaper comment here and there, not because it may be political policy, but because of the effect that the departure from the rule will have in the future. For in this body, which is the supreme judge of these questions and from whose decision there is no appeal—a body which changes from year to year, being first in the control of one political party and then of another—it is essential that we should have fixed rules to be applied in all cases, no matter what party may be in power and whom it may affect.

Right here permit me to ask gentlemen on the other side this question: If you depart from this rule to-day what rule do you set up to guide us in the future? What new rule do you give us? Here you have a report which concedes that in the State of Mississippi there was an election held; that in that district every officer performed his duty in the form required by law; not a single formality neglected, from the opening of the polls until the credentials were finally issued by the governor. Yet you announce the singular conclusion that nobody in that district is entitled prima facie to a seat on this floor. If you mean to say that the House is to go behind the credentials of the member and ascertain by looking to the certified returns whether he ought to have been returned or not, then why not say so in your report? Why not say that in the future when a man comes here with credentials and copies of the canvass are filed showing that a majority of the votes in the boxes are against him he shall not be seated, but the canvass-sheets shall be regarded as prima facie and superior evidence? That horn of the dilemma you must take or you can not sustain this report. If that be true, why is not somebody elected prima facie? Why is not Chalmers entitled to the seat? I do not object so much to what the rule may be, only that it be considered fixed and certain; and if you wish to depart from the old rule and set a new precedent, it should be declared in such a manner that it can be distinctly understood.

I turn now to the positions taken by my friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], whose arguments I wish especially to answer because they addressed themselves to the argument of the case without any reference to political matters, and for this reason I turn with pleasure from some of the other speeches to answer these gentlemen. The gentleman from Georgia said that the certificate was only prima facie evidence of the title. I concede that as true if there is any title in this matter. The certificate of election, I concede, is only prima facie evidence of election; but I say it is all the prima facie evidence; and I only need to turn to the report of my friend the chairman of the committee, who thought I was a little caustic in the minority report; and I want to say to him that I did not intend to be so. I turn to his report to show the truth of what I say. And, gentlemen of the majority, you yourselves concede that the prima facie evidence of election is exclusively in the governor's certificate. You say that Mr. Chalmers, not having credentials, is not entitled prima facie to a seat in this House; that there is no prima facie evidence to show the election of Mr. Chalmers. Why? Because he has not the governor's certificate of election. If no man can be seated here unless he has the certificate of election, then it must be because the prima facie evidence of the whole case is locked up in that certificate. Your argument is right: the certificate is the final conclusion; it is the prima facie evidence that overlies all the rest.

McCrary, in Law of Elections, says:

The regular certificate of election, properly signed, is, as we have seen, to be taken as sufficient to authorize the person holding it to be sworn in. It is prima facie evidence of his election, and the only evidence thereof which can be considered in the first instance and in the course of the organization of a legislative body.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Why was this matter referred to the committee?

Mr. COOK. I will come to that right now. From the debate here you will find that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] expressly asserted that the secretary of state was the proper officer to issue credentials. They denied from their seats that the governor was the proper authority to issue the credentials, and they claimed that Mr. Chalmers's credentials were the proper ones in the case.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Permit me to read that part of the case. It is a part of my argument, but it may as well be stated here:

Mr. TUCKER. I would ask the gentleman from Indiana whether there is any certificate, according to the law of Mississippi, signed by the executive of the State, in favor of General Chalmers?

Mr. CALKINS. I will answer the gentleman by saying, if he refers to what I know about it personally, that it is my wish to present to the House a question of law arising upon the statutes of Mississippi on that point. Whether the governor has signed any certificate or not I do not know, but that the secretary of state under the law has made a certificate I do know as matter of fact, which I think under a fair construction of the statutes of Mississippi entitles General Chalmers to a prima facie seat upon the floor.

Mr. COOK. And not only that, but Mr. KEIFER, as I remember his remarks, insisted and claimed that the secretary of state was the proper authority from which the credentials should emanate. My friend from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] had before him on his desk—and I do not suppose I am revealing any secret in making this statement—he had before him the statute of Mississippi, and was prepared to make an argument to the House, or at least I thought he was, because he looked that way, to show that the secretary of state was the proper authority to issue the certificate. I say the only question referred to the committee by this House was the question of who had been duly returned from that district, not who held the governor's certificate, because we as a body did not know the governor was the proper authority to issue it.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Is not the statute perfectly explicit on that point?

Mr. COOK. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] in their speeches took the other view, that the proper authority to issue the certificate was the secretary of state.

Mr. RANNEY. Does not the gentleman know that the following morning Mr. CONVERSE withdrew his resolution and presented this one pending?

Mr. COOK. Oh, yes; but is there to be drawn a distinction between one day and another in the proceedings of this House in reference to this case? Is a question to be cut in two by an adjournment?

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I think it would be proper, for fear the statement you make in reference to the gentleman from Indiana should go into the RECORD as an admission, that it should be known that gentleman is not now in his seat.

Mr. COOK. Oh, yes, he is; if the gentleman will look, he is right back there.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. There is so much confusion in the House that we can not understand really what is being said by the gentleman interrupting.

The SPEAKER called the House to order.

Mr. COOK. If there is any question about the matter I will read from the RECORD:

Mr. KEIFER. It is stated on the other side that the two cases are not here. I am informed that the certificate from the secretary of state of Mississippi—probably the only officer in the State authorized to make a certificate; we do not concede that the governor is authorized to make a certificate, and he does not himself claim that he is—the certificate of the secretary of state, regularly and properly filed here—

And my friend from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] stated that was the point he wished to present—that Mr. Chalmers's credentials emanated from the proper authority, and he ought to be sworn in.

Mr. CALKINS. Will my friend yield to me for a moment?

Mr. COOK. Certainly.

Mr. CALKINS. It was one of the questions I desired the Committee on Elections to determine on the prima facie right.

Mr. COOK. Yes, sir; but that was read by the gentleman from Arkansas on my left, and I therefore will not take up the time of the House by repeating it.

I want to come to the argument of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG]. He says, why did the House refer to the committee this question? Why did you refer in the North Carolina case the question of whether the old or the new district was the proper one to elect? Were you not as lawyers as competent to decide that in the House without the aid of the Committee on Elections as you are in this? And you referred that question to the committee, a question of law pure and simple.

What was referred here? The gentleman from Massachusetts says that it was everything that the majority of the committee has seen fit to report back. I beg to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he is in error. The resolution refers all the papers in the contested-election case, and if you are going to insist that that resolution made all the testimony competent, and the committee was bound to go into the testimony in the case regardless of what was prima facie and what was not, then I insist this committee was bound to investigate the testimony, and not simply the questions of who had a majority of the votes in the boxes; because, sir, it is not the majority of votes cast but the majority of legal votes cast that elects a member of this House, and if your construction is correct, why did not the committee go into the merits of the case fully? We have the case on the merit referred to us still. Certainly, when the resolution restricts the committee to the prima facie case, we were by that limited to such prima facie evidence as we found among the papers referred.

When a court refers a case to a referee and refers all of the papers and all of the evidence in the case, that does not compel the referee to take into account all of that testimony when the court by its order limits the decision of the referee to a certain question, for that implies that the referee will only consider testimony competent and relevant to that issue. So I insist that the words "prima facie case," when the House directed us to report as to who had the prima facie right to a seat on this floor, limited us to the prima facie evidence exclusively. Now, that is true.

But I want to call attention to the further fact that Mr. McCrary and all other authors on the subject lay it down as a rule that only the final credentials are prima facie evidence. Will it be contended here that this Committee on Elections in its consideration of a given case is to be governed by a different rule from what the House is? The House had before it the question of the prima facie case in this instance, and no gentleman upon the committee, with I believe a single exception, has yet to my knowledge said anything other than that if the vote had been taken here to seat Mr. Manning upon the original resolution he would have voted to seat him. Why is it different now from what it was then? Did the House intend to refer to the committee a question different from the one which the House itself had before it? The House had before it the question of the prima facie right to be sworn in. It had before it the question of who was returned from the second Congressional district in the State of Mississippi.

Now, would you have us to understand that somewhere between the House and the committee and back to the House there has been a change? In this House you could not, as you admit, have refused Mr. Manning his seat under his credentials, but you referred them to the Committee on Elections to do for you what you could not do yourselves. You talk about Mr. Manning wanting this House to do what he would not do himself. You admit that you would have been obliged to seat him upon his credentials as duly returned. Why do you want us now to do something entirely different?

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has twenty-one minutes of his time.

Mr. COOK. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it is a matter of any great importance whether one or the other of these men is seated or whether neither of them is seated; but I do appeal to this House, standing here in the presence of the future, to look to the fact that in deciding this case you establish a precedent for the future as well as determine a case for to-day. It may be an outrage to seat Manning. You have committed outrages before in seating Chalmers upon this floor. You have seated him when everybody knew he had not a majority of the votes cast. I am not criticising any of the past decisions of this House nor its acts. I only say to you as members of this House that you ought not adopt one rule for to-day and another for to-morrow.

Go with me back to the last Congress, when Lowe and Wheeler were here to be sworn in. It will be remembered that there was a contest in that case. When Mr. Wheeler, of Alabama, presented his credentials Governor Jones, of Texas, rose and objected, and presented here certified copies of the returns from that district, showing that Wheeler had not been elected, but that Lowe had a majority of the votes cast, who on that side of the House did not contend that the only question was who had been returned? And on this side of the House nine-tenths of you voted to seat Wheeler because he was duly returned and because he had the prima facie right to be sworn in.

Mr. BRUMM. Let me interrupt the gentleman here for a question.

Mr. PETTIBONE. But he never came in here and denied his own title.

Mr. COOK. One at a time, please.

Mr. BRUMM. Let me ask the gentleman, was not the question raised there upon the organization of the House in the first place?

Mr. COOK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRUMM. Then, again, did not you yourself at that time contend that Mr. Lowe should have been sworn in, or at least that the returns should have been submitted to the House?

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, in the first place, that is an unfair question, because I was then a contestant for a seat on this floor myself and not a sitting member. I was looking over from the outside and was naturally in favor of contestants.

But coming to the question of the gentleman. He is in error, for I insisted then that there was no other way except to swear in the man who was duly returned, which was Mr. Wheeler.

Mr. BRUMM. Who was duly returned; but not the man who had the certificate, because it happened that the man who was duly returned had not the certificate.

Mr. COOK. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That is entirely a misapprehension of my position.

Mr. BRUMM. Did not you contend that Lowe was not duly returned?

Mr. COOK. Certainly. Lowe was not returned as elected, though elected in fact, as the House afterward decided.

Mr. BRUMM. Then is not that the position that I have stated you occupied?

Mr. COOK. My position was this: that Wheeler was duly returned to the House——

Mr. BRUMM. He had the certificate.

Mr. COOK. That he was duly returned, though he was not in fact elected. That was my position. There may be a difference between a member returned and a member elected. A member is duly returned when he is returned in due form.

Mr. BRUMM. Do I understand the gentleman to mean that to have the certificate means being duly returned? That the man having the certificate is the man duly returned? Is that your idea?

Mr. COOK. Most certainly. It is the man who holds the credentials.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman pardon me for one moment more? The question I put to him was whether he did not contend that Mr. Lowe was duly returned by the returning board, but that the governor paid no attention to the return, but gave his certificate to Mr. Wheeler?

Mr. COOK. I know of nothing in the shape of a return of a member to this House except the paper he is obliged to present here when he is sworn in. That constitutes his credentials and constitutes the return of a member. While the one in that case was duly elected, the other had been duly returned. And I ask who on this side of the House did not vote to seat him?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the great bugbear in this case, and that is Mr. Manning's admissions. When passing upon a question of law no court has reference to or is governed in its decision of the law of the case by the question as to whether one or the other of the parties litigant has made a fool of himself. That does not affect the law of the case. You say Mr. Manning has admitted—what? I have heard it stated here over and over again that he had admitted that he was not elected. I say that is not correct. He has not admitted that he was not elected. He admitted that a certain mistake had occurred in the canvass, and if you want the most that can possibly be claimed for that admission I will concede he admitted the majority of votes cast were against him. But I say in the first place that admission is not upon the prima facie case. It is in the contest upon the merits; it is upon the election of Mr. Manning.

Mr. HART. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. COOK. I will yield just once, seeing it is the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HART. I ask the gentleman whether by the pleadings in the case, the notice of Chalmers and the answer of Manning, the question of prima facie title is not expressly put in issue?

Mr. COOK. I respond to that by saying that no notice of contest can put in issue the prima facie right. The statute does not authorize it. The statute provides that he who wants to contest the seat of a member who has been returned shall serve notice. You never saw, nor any one else in this House, the question raised on the prima facie right to a seat by notice and answer. That is, a notice of contest upon the merits and answer upon the merits.

But it is remarkable that these gentlemen will insist on going so far and no further. Mr. Manning, while he may have admitted that a majority of the votes in the boxes were against him, asserted as broadly that a majority of the legal votes cast were in his favor. He insisted that he had been duly elected by a majority of the legal votes cast.

Now you, my friends, who want to go back of the certificate, why do you not go back two steps? You have the evidence all referred to you in this resolution of reference. Look at it, and you will find it refers all the papers in the election case. Why do you simply go this one step? Is it because Chalmers invites you to one step? Chalmers says to you, "If you will go with me one step behind the credentials I will show you I was elected." Manning retorts, "While that may be true, if you will go with me another step I will show you I was elected and not Chalmers." Now, why do you go back one step and not the two? If all these papers must be considered, regardless of whether they bear on the prima facie case or not, why do you not go back and investigate whether a majority of the votes legally cast were for the one or for the other?

And right here I want to say a word by way of a digression from the prima facie case in answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN ALSTYNE], who yesterday criticised the committee because we had not got to the merits of the case and he had reached them long ago. Mr. Speaker, I have always found that the judicial mind reaches the best conclusion when it confines itself to the questions before it and decides them in the order in which they properly come. When we come to the merits of this case I shall give it patient attention, and try to give it an impartial decision. But I may be permitted to say this much to the gentleman from New York, I being here not upon one side or the other in this House, that if the facts alleged in the answer are true; if it is proven by testimony in connection with contemporaneous historical facts, of which, under the rules heretofore adopted, the committee and the House take cognizance; if it be true that the candidacy of Mr. Chalmers was conceived in sin and carried through by the corrupt use of Federal patronage and money from the Treasury by the appointment of men under the guise of being revenue officers but really to conduct his canvass; if it be true that the conveyances carrying Chalmers and his friends out over that district in his canvass were paid for by money out of the Treasury of the United States; if it be true that by the corrupt use of money and the abuse of the Federal election laws in the appointment of special deputy marshals to interfere with the election improperly—if that be true, as Manning charges in his answer, I want to say here I shall hesitate long before I shall consent by my vote to seat him upon such an election.

I want now to go back to the question of admission. And right here I will say that I am not going to take so broad a position upon that as most of the gentlemen on my left have taken. A man can concede away his case in an election contest upon the merits; he can not concede away the prima facie case, however. A man who is duly commissioned as an officer holds that office, and can surrender it only by resignation or by a vacancy occurring in the manner provided by law.

I need not again read the extract from McCrary which I read yesterday. But I hold that it must be conceded by every lawyer on this floor, upon a moment's reflection, that if a man is invested with an office he can not by a naked admission concede that office to another, or even create a vacancy in it except by resignation or in some other manner provided by law. When you come to the merits of the case, when you come to the election contest upon the merits, then the admissions made by Mr. Manning will stand against him and will do away with the necessity of proving the facts which he has admitted.

Now, right here you gentlemen concede that you ought not to go behind the certificate, behind the credentials. How do you know that Mr. Manning has made any admissions? Are they in his credentials? Do you find them by investigating and judging of his returns? No; you find that fact by going into the merits of the case, by going back of the certificates into the evidence in the case upon the final contest.

If the rule is true, and you concede it, that the credentials are conclusive prima facie evidence, are the only prima facie evidence, then how do you know that there are any admissions in this case? I repeat that you can find them only by going back of the credentials, by going into the merits of the case.

But I claim that Mr. Manning has not admitted that he was not elected, for he claims he was elected. We come next to the statement by him in his answer that he will not file his certificate nor attempt to take a seat in this House until he is vindicated and the House shall have confirmed his right thereto. Very well; to what does that refer? You say that Mr. Chalmers denies the right of Mr. Manning prima facie to the seat. Mr. Manning then had two charges to meet: first, as to his prima facie right; and, second, as to the right upon the merits of the case. He said, "I will not submit my credentials or ask to be sworn in until the House has decided that I am prima facie entitled to the seat." Now, that is just what he has done.

Now, one remark in answer to my friend from Georgia [Mr. TURNER]. He criticised me for the minority report, as he calls it, because I say that Mr. Manning's failure to present his credentials earlier is not without precedent. Why, sir, the gentleman himself in his argument showed that for more than half a century the custom was for members of Congress to come here with their credentials in their pockets and submit them as they were asked to be sworn in, and the credentials were then read at the Clerk's desk and passed upon.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Will the gentleman pardon me?

Mr. COOK. Certainly.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. My statement was that it was unusual, since the act of Congress was passed fixing the period at which a member's salary began.

Mr. COOK. Well, but in my report I had reference to the entire time that Congress had existed, and you criticised that. I have not inquired whether some member has not filed his credentials after the 1st day of December or not. Certainly I do not believe that every one filed his credentials before the 1st of December last. I know that one did not. I was elected to fill a vacancy, and I did not file my credentials here until the day preceding the organization of this House, nearly three months after I was elected. Is my right to my seat here to be brought into question because of the delay in filing my credentials?

Does the gentleman from Georgia want to put this question upon the ground that Mr. Manning failed to file his credentials in due time? Where is the law that requires a man to file his credentials here at any particular time? I submit to the judgment of every lawyer in this House, and of every member who is not a lawyer, that any man may come here with credentials after the organization of the House and present them, and his right is not impaired by the delay.

The next argument is that Mr. Manning is not claiming his seat. I have heard the remark made by some gentlemen that if Mr. Manning will come forward, present his credentials, and claim his seat under them, they will vote for him to be sworn in, and if he will not do that they will not vote for him

Why, it looks to me as though one of the things that has bothered the Committee on Elections has been the fact that Mr. Manning has been insisting upon his right to the seat from first to last. He appeared before the committee and urged it. And I believe I will not be going outside of the record or saying anything not complimentary to any one when I ask members here to look around and say if both Mr. Manning and Mr. Chalmers have not been here claiming the seat from the very beginning and with a great deal of energy.

But is Mr. Manning to be refused his seat because he asked that the Committee on Elections shall decide judicially and fairly whether or not he should be sworn in under his credentials? In asking that did he surrender any of his rights?

Why, sir, if I held a note on my friend here from New York [Mr. POTTER] and he refused to pay it, and I went into court and asked for judgment upon it, asked the court to decide whether I was entitled to recover upon that note or not, would the court answer me and say that by bringing that note into court I had surrendered it?

On the subject of admissions I beg to refer to the report made by a gentleman [Mr. RANNEY] who, I understand, is to follow me, or who at least concurs in the views of the majority of the committee; and I believe he bases his opinion largely, if not wholly, upon the fact that Mr. Manning has made certain admissions in his answer. I have here a report with which I am very familiar, because I have read it frequently.

Mr. RANNEY. I do not base my position alone upon that.

Mr. COOK. Well, you base it a little upon that now, don't you?

Mr. RANNEY. A good deal.

Mr. COOK. All right. I hold here the report made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] in the case of Cook vs. Cutts in the last Congress. From this report I read the following language:

It is not in the power of a contestee to give away the rights of the public and allow another man to take the seat even by consent.

Is that good law?

Mr. RANNEY. Yes; I agree to that now.

Mr. COOK. The gentleman agrees to that now. I did not agree to it then, and I do not agree to it now as broadly as it is stated. He has a right to concede away his case upon the merits, because when a contest is inaugurated and we approach the question whether a man has been elected or not the case stands inter partes. The law makes him there the representative of the people of his district who have voted for him. It requires him to shape the issues by his answer. He may admit or deny. He can admit facts, and if they are reasonable, and there is reasonable ground for it in the evidence, that is conclusive upon him in the final contest upon the merits.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be considerable doubt on our side of the House as to the power of the Committee on Elections, under the resolution referring this case to that committee. I desire, therefore, at the outset to call attention to the peculiar phraseology of the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] on the second day of this session. It was suggested by the Chair that the gentleman put the resolution in writing; and I now read it as originally offered, in order to call attention to the difference between that form of the resolution and the one finally adopted. As originally offered the resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the certificate and all other papers in the contested-election case of J. R. Chalmers vs. Van H. Manning, from the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi, be referred to the Committee on Elections when appointed, with instructions to report immediately whether, upon the prima facie case as presented by said papers said Manning is entitled to be sworn in as a member pending the contest on the merits, and not to affect the final right to said seat.

To that resolution the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] objected, saying:

I object to that resolution, unless it be so modified as to read "said Manning or said Chalmers."

Mr. BLACKBURN (to Mr. CONVERSE). Put that in.

Mr. CONVERSE. I have no objection to that.

And the resolution as finally adopted submitted the question to our committee with instructions to report immediately whether upon the prima facie case as presented by said papers said Manning or Chalmers is entitled to be sworn in as a member pending the contest on the merits, and not to affect the final right to said seat.

Now, it seems to me that every member of this House, in voting on that resolution and referring the question to the Committee on Elections, understood precisely the scope and authority conferred upon the committee—understood that the resolution itself did not in any respect limit the committee to the mere question as to who had or had not a certificate of election from the governor of the State of Mississippi.

At the outset of this discussion I ask permission to call attention to sections 140 and 141 of the Mississippi code of 1880, under which this election was had:

SEC. 140. The commissioners of election shall within ten days after the day of election transmit to the secretary of state, to be filed in his office, a statement of the whole number of votes given in their county for each candidate voted for in such county.

SEC. 141. The secretary of state, immediately after receiving the returns of any election, not longer than thirty days after such election, shall proceed to sum up the whole number of votes given for each candidate and to ascertain the person or persons having the greatest number of votes for each office, and shall declare such person or persons to be elected; and thereupon all persons chosen to any office at such election shall be commissioned by the governor.

I call attention to the word "statement" in section 140, and in this connection I ask gentlemen to look at the certificate of election filed by the commissioners of Tate County, as it appears upon page 1 of the printed case:

We, the undersigned, commissioners of election for Tate County, do certify that at an election held in Tate County, November 7, 1882, for the office of Representative in the lower House of the Congress of the United States, Van H. Manning received in said county eleven hundred and sixty-six (1,166) votes; James R. Chalmers, fourteen hundred and seventy-two (1,472) votes; Hannibal C. Carter, three (3) votes.

Witness our signatures, November 11, A. D. 1882.

E. L. WEEMS,
V. P. STILL,
R. O. MOSBY,
Commissioners of Election of Tate County.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the question for the Committee on Elections to determine in accordance with the resolution under which we acted was whether or not the secretary of state of the State of Mississippi when he certified that Mr. Manning was elected complied with the letter of the law of that State.

Let me call attention here to one of the most remarkable facts in this contested-election case, which has not been alluded to by any preceding speaker on this floor.

The gentleman who wrote the minority report uses, on page 19, this language:

And just here it may be proper to call attention to the fact that the return from Tate County over the construction of which we differ is not correctly printed. The tabular statement should come first, the certificate of the commissioners of Tate County to its correctness next, and then the certificate of the secretary of State that the copy before us is a transcript from the original.

By that language he wished to have this House understand that the law of Mississippi required a tabular statement to be sent by the county commissioners to the secretary of state from every county comprising each Congressional district in that State. At page 155, in the return from Tallahatchee County, this is the return:

THE STATE OF MISSISSIPPI,
Tallahatchee County:

At an election held in the county of Tallahatchee, State of Mississippi, on the 7th day of November, 1882, for member of Congress in the second Congressional district of the State for the Forty-eighth Congress United States, the following is the number votes polled for the following-named persons, to wit:

For Van H. Manning, 455 votes.
For Jas. R. Chalmers, 429 votes.
For Ham Carter, 6 votes.

We, the undersigned, commissioners of election, duly commissiond and appointed to make out and canvass the returns of the different voting-precincts of the county, after having duly examined and compared the votes, find that the above as stated is the true number votes cast for the individuals as stated above.

Witness this 8th day November, A. D. 1882.

A. B. BETTS.
B. T. WINN.
M. BLACK.

(Indorsed:) Tallahatchee. Rec'd by mail Nov. 12, '82. H. C. Myers, sec'y state.

That is the certificate sent by the county commissioners to the secretary of state under the law of Mississippi.

I will also call your attention to the return from Union County, to be found on page 156:

THE STATE OF MISSISSIPPI,
Union County:

We, the commissioners of election for Union County, State of Mississippi, duly appointed and sworn, certify that the following is a true, correct, and impartial return of all the votes polled at the different voting precincts in said county for the officers therein named, on Tuesday, the 7th day of November, A. D. 1882:

For Congress: Van H. Manning	1,241
For Congress: James R. Chalmers	133
For Congress: H. C. Carter	8
For Co. surveyor: A. F. Yerby	223
For Co. surveyor: William Liddell	13

Given under our hands this the 8th day of November, A. D. 1882.

Y. B. SLOAN,
T. J. SMITH.

(Indorsed:) Union. Rec'd by mail Nov. 10, '82. H. C. Myers, sec'y state.

I call the attention of the House to the remarkable fact that in the return certifying Manning was elected to a seat in this Congress, in computing or adding the whole number of votes in that Congressional district of Mississippi, the secretary of state took in every instance from the face of the certificates except this one from Tate County, and he deliberately ignored the writing under which the three commissioners certified, not that Chambless had received the vote, but that Chalmers had received it; that when he took the returns from all the other counties he took them from the face of the certificate and not from any tabular statement behind it.

Now, I claim that the certificate given to Mr. Manning by the governor of Mississippi does not confer upon him a prima facie right to a seat in this House. And right here, in connection with this point of tabular returns, let me call attention of the House to a precisely similar case in the ninth district of Wisconsin. Without going into the details, I will simply state that had the tabular statement in that instance been counted Mr. A. would have been elected, and if it had not Mr. B. would have been elected. If any gentleman wishes to see the law of Wisconsin he will find it reported in the fourth volume of the Wisconsin Reports. The language of that statute is identical with section 140 of the code of the State of Mississippi. When the matter was taken up for decision in the courts of that State it was held by the supreme court of Wisconsin as follows:

On the back of the return there is a tabular statement of the votes cast in each of the several towns and wards in said county for Representative in Congress, indicated by figures placed opposite the name of each town or ward, except the first ward in the city of Grand Rapids and the town of Lincoln, opposite each of which is written the following words: "Illegal and defective returns thrown out." It is alleged by the relator, and not denied by the respondents, that in such ward and town the relator received ninety (90) and George W. Cate fifty-six (56) votes: Held, That, rejecting the tabular statement as no part thereof, the return is valid and sufficient on its face, and the votes returned therein should be counted by the State canvassers.

Had the secretary of state of Mississippi on the 18th of November looked up the law he would have found that in the State of Wisconsin, under a statute similar in all respects, it was decided that a tabular statement on the back of a return formed no part of the return of a member from any Congressional district.

Now, there are three reasons why the certificate should not entitle Mr. Manning to a seat on this floor: First, the certificate is fraudulent; second, it was issued in direct violation of an injunction of a competent court in the State of Mississippi; third, he has himself refused to accept it, and declines to present himself here to be sworn in under it.

The certificate was issued on the 18th day of November, mark you, eleven days only after the election had occurred; and the secretary of state, as I am informed, had thirty days within which to certify to the governor the returns from each Congressional district in that election. On the 22d of November, four days after the circuit court of Mississippi had issued that injunction, and while it was still in force against an officer which the court decided it would run against, to wit, the secretary of state, he received a new or amended certificate from the election commissioners in Tate County, and here is what he says about it:

OFFICE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Jackson, Miss.

I, Henry C. Myers, secretary of state of the State of Mississippi, do certify that the foregoing page is a true and correct transcript of a paper or document received in this office by registered letter November 21, 1882, which paper or document I do not regard or recognize as constituting any part of the official papers or documents of my office.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Mississippi this 22d day of November, A. D. 1882.

[SEAL.] HENRY C. MYERS,
Secretary of State.

Now, I call the attention of the House to the judgment of the circuit court, which is as follows. You will understand that the injunction was in force then against the secretary of state on that day:

And to the end that speedy justice be done and the judgment of the court effectuated, it is further considered and adjudged that the peremptory writ of mandamus herein issue, directed to and reciting what is adjudged in this case, and commanding the respondent, and commanding him forthwith, to sum up the 1,472 votes from Tate County so wrongfully counted by him for J. R. Chambless with the other votes counted by him for the plaintiff, James R. Chalmers, so as to allow to the said Chalmers 9,729 votes, and to certify that Van H. Manning received at said election 8,749 votes; H. C. Carter, 129 votes; that the said Chalmers has received 9,729 votes, and, the same being a majority of all the votes cast, to declare him duly elected, as above adjudged, to the Forty-eighth Congress of the United States from the second Congressional district of Mississippi; and that he make return to the said court on or before the —— day of ——, A. D. 1883, so that this court, or the judge thereof in vacation, may determine what other and further steps may be necessary to the speedy and final determination of this controversy.

That is the judgment of the Mississippi court when he had in his possession the amended certificate, if you may call it such; but I claim that it was unnecessary for him to receive it at all, as the rightful certificate, certified to by the commissioners in that election, declared, not that Chambless had received those cast, but that James R. Chalmers had received in Tate County 1,472 votes on that day. Now, I do not care whether or not Mr. Manning conceded away his prima facie case or conceded away his case on the merits, I claim that he never had any case at all, either prima facie or upon the merits, to concede away; and I think I will conclusively show, before I get through with this argument, to my Democratic friends on this side of the House what is and what is not a prima facie case in law. I have given considerable attention, with the limited time I have had, to get a definition of what a prima facie case is, and I have found two, either of which the gentleman who has written this minority report and those who agree with him may adopt, as they please. One of them is given by an old Vermont farmer, who said a prima facie case is a case that is good on its face and is bad in its rear. [Laughter.] The other, Mr. Speaker, I get from so high authority as Mr. DAWES, formerly a member of this House. In order that some of the gentlemen may be relieved as to any doubt on this point, that the mere presentation of a certificate of an election to this House does not uniformly entitle the holder to a seat on this floor, I will read what Mr. DAWES says upon the subject. His language is:

When objection is made to a man's being sworn in on the presentation of his certificate, the House will look at the character of that objection, and if in the opinion of the House it is frivolous, it will admit him to his seat and proceed to the examination of the case. If in the opinion of the House it is a serious charge, made in good faith, then it has always been the precedent to refer the prima facie case to the committee.

Now, without taking up the time of the House with further definitions on the prima facie case, I say that the definition of Mr. DAWES is as true, as correct, and as just a one as can be found. My friend and colleague from New York on yesterday unfortunately in the course of his remarks referred to the electoral commission, and I am now going to ask the Clerk to read from the remarks of one of the most eminent lawyers that has ever lived in this country what his opinion was on the subject of the prima facie right on a certificate signed by the governor of the State of Florida. I refer to the distinguished Democratic lawyer the late Mr. Black; and I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

Why, this doctrine that a thing which is false, willfully false, is utterly void and good for nothing has been by this court (I mean by the Supreme Court) asserted a thousand times. Nay, I undertake to say that the contrary doctrine has never yet been set up by any judge or any lawyer whose authority is worth one straw. Suppose you have a case of a patent issued by the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the validity of which depends upon a confirmation by the court, and he falsely recites that the court delivered a judgment which the record shows it never did pronounce, and upon that basis puts the patent. Is the patent worth anything? Why is it worthless? Because it is based upon a fact which is untrue. "False" is "fraudulent" in all cases of this kind. When a man undertakes to say, "I certify to this fact," and at the time he does it there glares upon him from the record that lies before him the evidence that the fact is the other way, is not that a fraudulent certificate? And if it be fraudulent, is it not as void in law and as corrupt in morals as if it were a simple counterfeit?

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the language of Mr. Black in the Florida case before the electoral commission, and that is good enough Democratic doctrine for me, and sound law for this House to follow now in administering it in this Manning-Chalmers controversy.

And he says:

And if it be fraudulent, is it not as void in law and as corrupt in morals as if it were a simple counterfeit?

Now did not the secretary of state, under sections 140 and 141 of the code of Mississippi, when he certified to the governor of the State that Manning was elected, did he not certify to a fact that was not true? There can be no question of doubt in the mind of any reasonable man that he certified to what was not true when he deliberately put the great seal of the State of Mississippi to that certificate. I believe my friend from Iowa [Mr. COOK] calls her a sovereign State. I claim that she is not sovereign, because there can be no such thing as a divided sovereignty. When you come here and present her certificate an objection is made. If her certificate alone was to guide and govern us we could not question it even although it was issued fraudulently, issued to a man who never ran at all, or who was disqualified and could not sit in this House. Now I read from page 55 the remarks of Mr. Merrick before the electoral commission.

He says, in speaking of the certificates:

These certificates each of them are only evidence that something has been done; are evidence that the individual to whom they are given has been invested with a power not granted by the governor, not granted by the executive power of the State, but that he has been invested with a power granted by the people, and of which grant this shall be the muniment of title.

And Mr. Hunton, one of the commissioners, says:

It has been declared that to go behind these certificates and to find contrary to them would be a violation of State rights. I am no advocate for State rights of the straitest sect. I did not, I do not expect to learn a lesson in that direction from those who have proclaimed it in this case. But in this case these new-made converts to the doctrine need have no apprehension, because the State of Florida, through the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of her State government, has labored to convince us and the country that the Hayes electors are not the duly appointed electors of that State. She has done what she could to correct this great wrong, and she relies on us to do the balance.

Did not the State court of Mississippi do what it could to correct this monstrous wrong committed by certain of her officers? And although the supreme court reversed that decision, still it did not reverse it on any such ground as is claimed for it here. And the State of Mississippi now, through her people, pleads here that we shall give effect to the finding of the only competent court in that State that has passed upon the question of that certificate and the right to the seat here.

I now read from the remarks of Mr. Justice Field, and I wish my friend from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] were here in order that he might listen to what that great lawyer said in that tribunal as to what constitutes a prima facie case:

The fact here to be ascertained is, who have been duly appointed electors of the State of Florida, not who have the certificates of appointment. It is the election—

I wish my friend from Iowa [Mr. COOK] was here to listen to this—it is the election and not the certificate which gives the right to the office. The certificate, being only evidence, can be overcome by any evidence which is in its nature superior. And this is equally true of the certificate issued under the law of the State as of the certificate issued under the act of Congress. And yet in the opinion of the distinguished commissioner from Indiana (Senator Morton), and some other commissioners from the Senate and House appear to concur with him, the determination of those canvassers, as expressed by their certificate, is more sacred and binding than the judgment of the highest court of the land, incapable of successful attack on any ground whatever. If this be sound doctrine, it is the only instance in the world where fraud becomes enshrined and sanctified behind a certificate of its authors.

That is the language of Mr. Justice Field of the Supreme Court of the United States.

I have now quoted the language of Mr. Justice Field, that of Mr. Black, that of Mr. Hunton, that of Mr. Merrick, arguing a case directly in point with the question which is raised here; for you will all remember that the question before that commission was not as to going behind the returns, but as to going behind the certificates to the returns to ascertain whether or not the votes that came out of the ballot-box were given for Mr. A or Mr. B.

The distinguished gentleman who preceded me said that he had not read any of the evidence in this case. And yet before he got through he went into a complete history of the question of taking money out of the United States Treasury for the purpose of electing Mr. Chalmers; and I submit that he has read every word of the testimony contained within these pages of this printed case, otherwise he would not have known whether or not there was any testimony contained therein as to who paid the money or when it was paid or by what officers of the Government.

The gentleman says in his report that it would be a great wrong to the people of that district of Mississippi if her 150,000 people should be deprived of a Representative on this floor. So say I. But it is a greater wrong and a double wrong when one of her sworn officers, sworn to uphold the law, deliberately falsifies the wishes of the whole constituency of the second district of Mississippi. I submit that when an officer like Mr. Myers certifies to what is not a fact, this House at least, in vindication of its honor and its rights, will spit upon the return which he makes, and send it back to the State of Mississippi, to teach him that when the people elect a man in any district in this country not his will but theirs shall govern.

Now, as we on this side have been protesting and will still protest against the unjust decisions of 1876, so now I appeal to every man on this side of the House, when the Democratic party is restored to power here, no matter what the decisions may have been on technical points of law, when a man is elected to the American House of Representatives the will of the people shall not be nullified by the act of any intermediate officer. That is good Democratic doctrine. And I state that I would have gone further than the report of the committee. I was willing to seat Mr. Chalmers, because I claim that the minute this House organizes, and its members are sworn into office, a certificate of election after its organization is not a condition precedent or a prerequisite to a seat on this floor. Otherwise no contestant could ever be seated here, as many have been since the foundation of the Government, without a certificate at all.

I ask members on this side of the House, in all fairness to gentlemen on the other side of the House, to state whether when they referred this matter to our committee they did not do so as the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] understood it when he said "Let it all go," every document connected with it, so as to ascertain whether Mr. Manning or Mr. Chalmers was elected to the seat.

And right here now, taking up the story which the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] told us this morning, let me say that Mr. Manning is in the exact position that the Irishman was who refused to take the medicine. Mr. Manning says to the Democratic party of this nation: "If you will only fill up that glass with hot toddy and force me to take it—if you will only force me into this House and divide the responsibility with me, I am willing to come forward and take my seat; otherwise I am not." Well, if he is not willing to take the medicine without being forced to do so, he can not come to me or to any other Democrat on this floor and ask us to divide the responsibility with him and with the secretary of state of Mississippi.

The evidence which was submitted to us shows that the secretary of state of Mississippi telegraphed for Mr. Manning's attorney. Now what did he want Mr. Manning's attorney at the capital for? The attorney swears in his testimony that he arrived in Jackson on the morning of the 18th of November, the day upon which this certificate was granted, and immediately conferred with the secretary of state. He also swears that he objected to two counties, the county of Tate and one other, which I have forgotten, but that he did not at the time know of the defect in the certificate from Tate County. Now I have no hesitation in saying that if Mr. Manning used this remarkable language in his answer I for one am going to hold him to it while I am a member of this House. This is the language:

I admit that the inspectors and clerks of the several election precincts did certify to the county commissioners of election in their respective counties that you received a majority of the votes cast; and I further admit that the 1,472 votes which the commissioners of Tate County returned as cast for J. R. Chambless were in fact cast for you, and that the name Chambless was inserted in the return by clerical error instead of your name.

And in this connection I state that because of said error, to your prejudice, I will not take a seat in said Congress or ask the Clerk to enroll my name as a member thereof until I have vindicated and the House shall have affirmed my right thereto.

That certainly is most remarkable language. Gentlemen talk about precedents. In the limited time which has been allowed me on the Committee of Elections I have not been able to find in the cases which I have read a single case where a man came into this House and said to the people of his State in her courts that he was not elected, and who further said that he would not take his seat here until the House had confirmed his right thereto.

Right in this connection let me refer to another matter. On the second day of this session the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] said that he was instructed—I had better read his language so as to give it correctly.

I am requested by Mr. Manning to ask unanimous consent of the House that the question of his prima facie right to a seat on this floor be referred to the standing Committee on Elections when appointed, with instructions to report thereon at the earliest day possible.

You, Mr. Speaker, asked the gentleman from Ohio to state his motion again, and said, "Perhaps it had better be put in writing, so that there may be no mistake about it." Now I would like to know who authorized the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] to submit to this House through the Committee of Elections the question of the right of a member to his seat; to give away what, as my friend from Iowa [Mr. COOK] says, can not be given away? Who gave the gentleman from Ohio the right to say that, speaking as the representative of Mr. Manning, he was willing to submit, not the case upon its merits, but the prima facie right to a seat on this floor?

Let me say in conclusion that if gentlemen here do not agree with the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections they should have the manhood and the courage to vote to accept the report of the minority of the committee. Do not send the case back to us. We can not enlighten you if you limit us to the certificate alone. Every member on this floor knows that Mr. Manning holds the certificate. If we are not to look to any accompanying papers how can we make a report other than that which every member of the House knows to-day?

I submit that in place of referring the case back to the Committee on Elections those who propose to refer it back to our committee for the purpose of having a cloak thrown around them by means of a report from the committee that Mr. Manning has the certificate, and upon that report they intend to seat him, should be more manly, and, in the language of the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, they should vote that Van H. Manning has "a certificate of election to the office of Representative * * * issued by the proper authority as required by the laws of the State of Mississippi," and, that being the only return, he is entitled to be sworn in and occupy a seat on this floor pending the contest on the merits.

In that way they will reach the same result, but will reach it in a more manly way than by referring that simple question to our committee. They will reach it in such a way that every Democrat who has a seat on this floor will have to answer to his constituents when he goes home why for the first time in the history of the American Government a man who in the courts of his own State openly admits that he was not elected to this House, admits that he is not entitled to the seat, admits that his opponent was elected, was seated by them in the face of those admissions.

Now I say to Mr. Manning, although I have no feeling in the case, that if his conscience was elastic enough to enable him to take that certificate from the secretary of state of Mississippi in direct violation of law, then let him stretch his conscience a little further, and come here like a man, present to the bar of this House the certificate which he has spit upon and which he has repudiated from the 18th day of November, 1882, down to the present hour.

I will inquire, Mr. Speaker, how much time I have left.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has fifteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] the remainder of my time.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I would not have desired to say anything on this question if it had not been for the very serious animadversions against the majority of the committee and their report that have been indulged in by various gentlemen. It has been charged that the committee failed entirely to understand the scope and extent of the commission intrusted to them; that they have gone beyond the duty required of them, and have assumed to do things not authorized by this House. It is to repel something of this charge, if I can, that I desire the attention of the House for a moment.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that the circumstances surrounding and immediately preceding this reference were somewhat peculiar. The other members of the House, having presented their credentials at a proper time and in a proper manner, had received the oath and been invested with the power to perform their functions here. But this gentleman, Mr. Manning, for reasons best known to himself, omitted to do that; and a member, after the organization of the House, attempted by a resolution to force upon him the duties of a member. After much debate, and after the intervention of an adjournment, a new resolution was introduced. That was fully discussed; it was amended; its phraseology was scanned and perfected; and as a result this language was used in the resolution:

That the certificate and all other papers in the contested-election case of J. R. Chalmers vs. Van H. Manning, from the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi, be referred to the Committee on Elections when appointed, with instructions to report immediately whether upon the prima facie case as presented by said papers said Manning or Chalmers is entitled to be sworn in as a member pending the contest.

That is the language of the resolution. The certificate and all of the papers were referred; and the committee were instructed to report as to the rights of these gentlemen from all of those papers.

Now, I take it, Mr. Speaker, that the House had the absolute right to determine what evidence should be considered by this committee. There are no limitations that can be placed upon the rights of this House under the Constitution of the United States in dealing with a question of this kind. The language of the Constitution is as follows:

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

No act of Congress that can be passed can limit the right of each succeeding House to determine what the evidences shall be upon which that particular House will seat a member. And although it may be wise, for the purpose of expediting the early organization of Congress, that there should be a rule established, as there is, for the Clerk to make out a roll entitling members, when we are all without the power to act, to receive the oath, yet as soon as the House is organized, as soon as it passes beyond that chaotic state to which this law is directed, then we have the right to determine what shall be considered in determining the prima facie case of a member. Exercising that right, this House did instruct its committee to look to the papers filed in the election case, and from all of those papers to determine the verities of the case.

Now, this resolution having been drafted by a lawyer, having been addressed to lawyers in the main, I suppose we have a right to assume that the gentleman who drew it used the words therein contained as they are ordinarily used by members of the legal profession. What are the papers in a contest? The mutual altercations of the parties; in other words, the pleadings, and possibly the documentary proof. Those were the papers that were referred; and we were instructed to look to all of these and determine from the face of all of them who, if any one, was entitled to this seat, and in pursuance of that duty we did proceed to the examination.

We found a certificate. Why, sir, every member of this House knew that there was a certificate of that character. The gentleman who introduced the resolution so stated to the House. The first resolution that was introduced recited in its preamble the fact. Yet, notwithstanding that, and notwithstanding the further fact that this committee has reported among other things that Van H. Manning does hold a certificate regular in form, conforming to all the requirements of the law, now, forsooth, certain gentlemen who want to call a halt in the march of proceedings desire that the matter should be recommitted to the committee with instructions to report whether or not Van H. Manning holds such a certificate, and nothing more.

What is the reason for that, Mr. Speaker? I confess, sir, that I am unable to determine it, unless it is that there is upon the part of certain gentlemen on that side of the House the settled and fixed determination to seat the gentleman named in this first resolution without reference to right or without reference to the facts as their own committee has determined them to be.

I confess, Mr. Speaker, that if we had simply been instructed by a resolution, such as has been offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to inquire into this case, there would have been no doubt in my mind that Mr. Manning should have had his seat upon the prima facie case. I was of that opinion up to the time when I found among the papers in the case referred to us that statement of his in which he himself impeaches the verity and the veracity of the certificate that he holds. Up to that time I had no doubts upon the question. But when I remembered that we were to inquire as to these papers who had a prima facie right, and when I found Mr. Manning's solemn admission in effect that his certificate was a fraud, that at least it was issued under a mistake, that it was issued because 1,472 votes had been omitted from the count which, if counted for Mr. Chalmers, would have entitled him to a certificate, then I had no hesitation in supposing that the report of this committee was correct, and should be sustained.

But, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen do not seem to remember the results of this report. The committee simply report in effect this resolution: Resolved, that the Committee on Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the prima facie right to the seat in the contested-election case of J. R. Chalmers against Van H. Manning. We simply ask that the matter rest until the committee, in further prosecution of the duties with which it is charged, shall be permitted to report on the merits of the case now pending.

And right here, Mr. Speaker, let me suggest to you that no man can have a right, prima facie or otherwise, to a seat in this House simply upon the fact that he holds a certificate. His right is based on the fact of an election, and it is begging the question to talk about the rights of a man to a seat on this floor who does not base that right on a preceding election. If he is admitted to the seat here at all pending a contest and in the absence of an election, it is simply at the most a courtesy. It is a case of leniency extended to him, and not because he can clamor for a right; for the right to a seat is the result of an election properly had by persons who were competent voters, and no other man can have any right to a seat here.

Yet gentlemen inquire why was it that certain members of the House voted to seat General Wheeler during the last Congress? General Wheeler presented his certificate. It was in due and proper form. It was while the House was in its formative state. It was at that period that he came to Congress. The House was not so organized it could assert the power invested in it by the Constitution. General Wheeler came here on the footing of every other member. There was no one who had the right to object, and if for a moment at the request of a member he stood aside, it was because it was of his own volition. He had the right then and there, as admitted on the floor at the time by all who discussed the matter, to insist if he saw fit to have the oath administered to him when his name was called. And the fact that he did stand aside was simply because he elected to do so, as was explicitly stated at the time. But, sir, if later on than that, if the House was organized and the question had then come up, he not having taken the oath and his rights not having been passed upon, I submit to you that then and there a different question would have been presented. There would have been an organized House, with power under the Constitution to determine the qualifications and elections of its members and fix for itself the limits to which it will go in hunting for its proofs to pass on the competency of evidence, as was done in this case.

The House has already passed on the competency of these proofs. They have instructed us where we were to look for evidence, and from the evidence to which our attention was directed to find our results and report them to the House.

Mr. LOWRY obtained the floor.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I hope we will be able at this time to make some arrangement as to the further progress of this debate. We have now nearly occupied two days in this discussion, and while I have no desire in the world to impose improper limits, I believe there ought to be at least some limit placed on the debate, so gentlemen may know when this matter shall close. I suggest to gentlemen on either side of this report whether we would not do well to fix the limit of discussion and agree the previous question shall be demanded at half past 4 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. BAYNE. Say 4.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. It is suggested all round me the previous question shall be called at 4 o'clock.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I do not think that would be right, as the gentleman from Indiana who has the floor is entitled to proceed for an hour, and that would cut off the right to be heard on the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana, having been recognized in his own right, is entitled to occupy the floor for an hour.

Mr. BAYNE. Perhaps he will agree to some arrangement for division of the time.

Mr. BENNETT. I am a member of the committee, and am entitled to an hour in my own right.

Mr. ROBERTSON. We might be able to agree we should have the next speech and then they could have the conclusion.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I have no desire to put limits to the debate in any way which would inconvenience any gentleman on the floor, much less any member of the committee, or to cut off any gentleman who may desire to support either report. I should like to inquire whether the hour of 5 could be fixed for ordering the previous question?

The SPEAKER. And take the vote in the morning or this evening?

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Speaker, it has been my desire at some time during the course of the debate upon this question to occupy some ten or fifteen minutes in presenting the views of myself and my colleagues on this controversy. As we are unanimous on this side of the House in favor of seating Mr. Manning upon the prima facie case, it will not be necessary, of course, to make an elaborate argument upon his right. But if any arrangement could be arrived at by which I may be able to occupy a few moments of the time for the purpose stated, it would be more satisfactory to me.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I would inquire of the gentleman from Mississippi whether it might not meet his views if we should order the previous question, say, at half past 5 this afternoon?

Mr. SINGLETON. I have no desire to protract the debate. I have said my only object is to give to my people and to this House the reasons which will influence the vote I expect to cast. But of course I am not to be understood by my remarks to commit myself or my colleagues to any line of policy when the case comes to be decided upon its merits.

Mr. LOWRY. So far from desiring to occupy the entire time allotted to me, I wish to state, in the first place, that by virtue of a prior arrangement I have agreed to yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], understanding the fact that his position on this question is different from my own. I do not now see him in his seat. It was understood that he would be here when the gentleman who last occupied the floor had closed his remarks.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia submit any proposition?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I have been anxious to arrive at some arrangement on this question, but it seems to be almost impracticable to do so without disappointing some gentlemen who wish to be heard. I would suggest, therefore, that the debate shall continue during this afternoon under the present arrangement, and that by unanimous consent the previous question may be considered as ordered when this matter is resumed in the morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I object.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. WARNER, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 152) for the relief of E. H. George and H. W. Walker; when the Speaker signed the same.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—CHALMERS VS. MANNING.

Mr. LOWRY. I perceive the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is now in his seat. I yield five minutes of my time to him.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, it is admitted here that Mr. Manning is duly returned to this House. It is admitted that this certificate would entitle him to a seat here pending the consideration of the merits. The next question which seems to be involved is whether Mr. Manning has waived any right which he has; whether, in addition, he could waive any representative right of a sovereign constituency. As to the first point of waiver, I do not clearly see that he has waived any right whatever. The time for him to waive such a right would be when he is asked to come to the bar of this House and to be qualified.

I do not think that he possesses the power to waive a legal right of representation. There is a great disagreement among the committee themselves as to the initial purpose of the House in referring this matter to the Committee on Elections. It is clear that somebody ought to sit here to represent the second district of Mississippi. Therefore, while I concede that the committee, or rather a majority of that committee, has acted fearlessly, honestly, and to their best judgment, yet I think it far wiser and more satisfactory that this question should be recommitted under the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, my colleague [Mr. CURTIN], to the committee.

I am not moved in any degree by the question as to what may be politic in the settlement and adjustment of this question. We have a plain duty to perform, and that is to determine whether the case is to be decided upon the merits or upon the prima facie title. In this condition of confusion among the committee it is quite natural that a corresponding degree of confusion should exist in this body; and I therefore believe that no injustice can be done to either of these parties by a recommittal of the case, but on the contrary that injustice by delay is being done to the second district of Mississippi in not immediately deciding the question of the prima facie simply, rather than risk further delay of that representation by entering on the merits.

Mr. RANNEY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. RANNEY. I wish to ask if the learned gentleman from Pennsylvania has not noticed in the report of the majority of the committee as it now stands that every single fact covered by this resolution pertaining to the submission of the question to the committee has been already considered just as he wants it done. Therefore I ask him why it is he wishes to recommit it.

Mr. RANDALL. I say it ought to be recommitted, so far as this committee is concerned, because of the fact of their having entered rather upon the merits of the contest than a decision of the prima facie.

Mr. RANNEY. But every fact is already covered by the report of your committee.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman may assert that opinion, but yet the majority of the committee do not, as I am led to believe from the fact that one gentleman now present, a member of the committee, gives me an affirmative response in that particular.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOWRY addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HART obtained the floor.

Mr. COOK. Before the gentleman from Ohio proceeds I would be glad if we could reach some understanding as to the time and order of the debate that is yet to be had. Two hours have been occupied in succession upon one side. It seems to me the speeches should alternate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would have recognized the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT] to speak in opposition to the report of the majority of the committee, but that gentleman preferred not to be recognized this afternoon.

Mr. COOK. Then I wish to inquire of the House whether we can arrive at some understanding with reference to the time when this debate is to close.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any suggestion to make?

Mr. COOK. I suggest that one hour be consumed upon the side opposed to the report, and that to-morrow morning the previous question be considered as ordered. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] has kindly consented to yield to me, for distribution among members on this side, one-half of his closing hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he has endeavored to recognize gentlemen first on one side and then on the other, and has done so until the last two hours; but there were more gentlemen on the committee desiring to speak in support of the report than those who desired to speak against it; hence it became necessary to allow two speeches in succession on the same side. The Chair would then have recognized the gentleman from North Carolina to speak against the report if that gentleman had not expressed to the Chair a preference that he should not be recognized this afternoon.

Mr. COOK. Then, as there are numerous gentlemen who wish to speak on that side, I suggest the propriety of so occupying an hour now, so that when we come to limit debate there will have been something like an equal distribution of the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HART] is recognized, and will proceed if he desires to do so.

Mr. KEIFER. With the permission of my colleague, I desire to make the announcement that on Tuesday next I will ask the House to consider the Military Academy appropriation bill.

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, I am aware, sir, the hour is late and the House may be weary of this debate. No doubt there are many members here who would like to determine the question by a vote to-night, and under these circumstances I feel I would be unduly trespassing on the time of this body if I were to enter into a lengthy argument. But as a member of the committee it is proper for me to state what I understand were the reasons for the action of the majority of that committee as well as give the reasons which shall govern my vote.

Let me, if I can, restate the question as I understand it to have been presented to this House. On the first day of this session, after the House had organized by the election of its Speaker, my friend from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] rose in his place and presented the credentials of Mr. Manning, and asked that he might be sworn in. Objection was made and debate followed. By and by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] offered a substitute for the resolution, declaring it was the sense of the House that the certificate and the other papers filed by Mr. Chalmers should go to the Committee on Elections and there the case of the prima facie title should be determined. That ended the first day's work. On the morning of the next day the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] arose and stated to the House that at the request of Mr. Manning and by his authority he proposed this matter should be referred to the Committee on Elections. Afterward, at the suggestion of the Speaker, he reduced his resolution to writing. That resolution has been frequently read here in argument. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the certificate and all other papers in the contested-election case of J. R. Chalmers vs. Van H. Manning, from the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi, be referred to the Committee on Elections when appointed, with instructions to report immediately whether, upon the prima facie case as presented by said papers, said Manning is entitled to be sworn in as a member pending the contest on the merits, and not to affect the final right to said seat.

The only modification afterward made by the House was the insertion of the name of Chalmers, so that the prima facie title of both gentlemen was to be examined. By the terms of that resolution and by the common consent and authority of this body the certificate of election, together with the other papers in the case of Chalmers vs. Manning, was sent to the committee for examination and report.

There is no possible misunderstanding the meaning of that resolution. There is no misunderstanding the purpose and scope of the instructions given to the committee. The House in effect declared that in the consideration and determination of this prima facie case not the certificate alone but that all the other papers in the case should be examined by the committee and they should make their report upon them. The action of the House was mandatory, and if the Committee on Elections had refused to examine the papers presented to them they would have acted in disobedience of the instructions of this body and in contempt of its authority.

What were the papers presented to the consideration of that committee? First, there was the certificate of Mr. Manning signed by the governor of Mississippi. There was another paper giving the returns from the different election precincts and counties of the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi. Another paper was from the commissioners of election of Tate County, and in that certificate they declare that 1,472 votes were cast in Tate County for James R. Chalmers.

There was on the reverse side of that paper what purported to be a tabulated statement on which the returns from the several precincts were reported, and there the word "Chalmers" was written "Chambless." There was also the affidavit of the clerk of the commissioners of election, and in that affidavit he swears that the word "Chambless" was a clerical error; that the vote was cast for Chalmers, counted for Chalmers, returned for Chalmers, and that the certificate of the commissioners of election of Tate County was true and correct. There was another paper also submitted for the consideration of the committee, and I want to call the special attention of the House to it.

The election was held on the 7th day of November. The secretary of state had thirty days within which to open the returns and announce the result. On the 18th day of November, eleven days after the election, he proceeded in his office to open the returns and examine them; and while he was in the discharge of this duty, before he had counted the returns, before he had announced the result, there was served upon him a restraining order, issued by the judge of the circuit court of the ninth judicial district of the State of Mississippi, commanding him not to proceed with the count until the question of clerical error was determined. That paper, I say, was also before the committee.

The secretary of state on the 18th day of November, 1882, had all this knowledge and information that the House is now in possession of, and he knew that the word "Chambless" was a clerical error. He knew that 1,472 votes in Tate County were cast for Chalmers. He knew that according to the returns from that Congressional district a majority of the votes had been cast for Chalmers, and that he was legally elected to Congress from the second Congressional district of Mississippi. And yet, sir, in utter disregard of all the facts and all of the information in his possession, in disregard of the special protest of those who claimed them for Mr. Chalmers and that by these votes he was legally elected, in disobedience to the order of the court, and in defiance of the judicial authority of the State, he proceeded to count and did count the vote of Tate County for "Chambless," refusing to give it to Chalmers, and decided that Manning was legally elected in that district. It is not necessary for me, Mr. Speaker, in the examination that I make of this case now, to utter any comment upon the action of the secretary of state of that Commonwealth.

But I proceed further. These were the circumstances under which the certificate was given to Manning and issued by the governor of the State of Mississippi, and it constitutes the first chapter in this miserable business. What next? There was but one thing left for Chalmers to do; and after the certificate had been issued by the governor of Mississippi giving the right to a seat to Mr. Manning—I say after that had been done Mr. Chalmers filed his notice of contest, and in that notice of contest he expressly puts in issue not alone the question of who was in fact elected in the second district of Mississippi but also the prima facie title of Mr. Manning to a seat. That calls my attention to another paper before the committee. Mr. Chalmers in his notice sets forth that the certificate was illegally issued; that it was the result of fraud and criminal conspiracy. Now, sir, to that issue tendered by Mr. Chalmers Mr. Manning comes in and files his answer, as he is required to by the statutes of the United States in such cases.

I will not occupy the time of the House, when I know that the members are weary, by examining in detail the different provisions of the answer that was filed by Mr. Manning. But it does not avail our friends upon the other side to say that the answer in some parts of it declares in general terms that Chalmers was not elected. Mr. Manning nowhere asserts that he himself was elected, and in a paragraph of his answer which has been read in the hearing of the House he uses the following language:

I deny that any frauds were attempted or practiced by my friends, or that they were guilty of fraudulent or illegal practices, or that you received a majority of 1,332 votes as a member of the Forty-eighth Congress from said Congressional district, though I admit that the inspectors and clerks of the several election precincts did certify to the county commissioners of election in their respective counties that you received a majority of the votes cast; and I further admit that the 1,472 votes which the commissioners of Tate County returned as cast for J. R. Chambless were in fact cast for you, and that the name Chambless was inserted in the return by clerical error instead of your name.

And in this connection I state that, because of said error, to your prejudice, I will not take a seat in said Congress or ask the Clerk to enroll my name as a member thereof until I have vindicated and the House shall have affirmed my right thereto.

Here is the admission of a particular and specific fact, which, being a fact, shows that he is not entitled to the certificate, but that it should have been given to his opponent. He admits that a majority of the votes as shown by the returns from the second district of the State at that election were cast for Mr. Chalmers. He admits that the 1,472 votes cast in Tate County were cast for Mr. Chalmers, and admits that Chalmers on the face of the returns is elected. And so emphatic and so earnest is he in his declaration, that he declares he will not take the certificate, will not file it, and will not claim his seat under it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what was the effect of that answer? I say if ever a man could be estopped by a pleading filed in a case, Mr. Manning is estopped in this instance. By that answer he enters a confession of judgment against himself. It is a solemn declaration of record that the certificate he holds was issued without warrant or authority of law; that it is founded in mistake, or in fraud, or in corrupt and criminal conspiracy. That is the admission of the answer, and there can be no other honest construction given to it. Now, sir, after Mr. Manning has published to the world his declaration in regard to the character and result of the elections in that second district, what is proposed to be done by this House?

It is now proposed by Mr. Manning and his friends that this House of Representatives shall take that certificate, that paper which Manning himself has invalidated and repudiated, which he has himself stamped with corruption, infamy, and invalidity—it is proposed, I say, that this House shall take that invalidated paper and clothe it with legal authority and force and upon it place him in his seat. Mr. Manning assures his opponent and he assures the country that he can not voluntarily take that certificate, that he will not voluntarily take this seat, but he is willing to be forced into it; he is willing to take that at the hands of this House which he admits as an honorable man he can never receive. Now, is there any dodging that conclusion? Here he stands before the House and before the country. By his own hand, his own declaration solemnly of record, he has admitted that his title is insufficient in law and insufficient in fact; and yet he asks this House to do that for him which he can not honorably do for himself.

I hope the American Congress will not for a moment put itself in an attitude so ridiculous as that before the country.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I want to refer for a moment to some of the arguments that have been made on the other side. For my part, I have as yet been unable to hear any satisfactory answer to the position taken by the majority of this committee. What are the arguments? It was said yesterday afternoon in the debate by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] that the admission of Manning in his answer ought not to have any weight and should not be considered by the members of this House; and he gives as an illustration of his argument that courts of justice will not allow a man when charged with a grave offense to be condemned or sentenced upon a plea of guilty. I think, with all due respect, that that was a very unfortunate illustration. By it he likens Mr. Manning to a criminal who is asking and pleading for the protection of the law and the mercy of a court.

But the illustration was unfortunate in another respect. Everybody knows who has had any familiarity with courts at all that, except for the crime of murder in the first degree, courts are constantly taking the confessions and pleas of guilty and men are sentenced to the penitentiary every day upon their own confessions and their pleas of guilty. And, more than that, it is well known that in civil courts and in civil actions the pleadings of the parties are binding upon them; and when a defendant in a case files his answer we understand he is concluded by the admissions he makes in it. My friends on the other side must be driven to terrible extremity when they are compelled to place Mr. Manning in the position of a criminal at the bar of court and ask for him exemption from the force and effect of his answers in this case.

But, Mr. Speaker, another ground is also taken, and that is one which is especially relied upon by several gentlemen here, and particularly by my friend from the State of Iowa [Mr. COOK], and what is that? Why, they say that a man who is a member of Congress can not confess away the rights of his constituency; that he stands there in a representative capacity, and that no admission in the world that he could make can be of binding force and validity. One gentleman has gone so far in his argument in this case, and I think, if I remember rightly, it appears in the report of the minority of the committee, as to say that 150,000 or 160,000 people in the second Congressional district of Mississippi have a right to be consulted in this case, and are not concluded by the answer of Mr. Manning. I apprehend the people of the second district of Mississippi have been consulted. They were consulted on the 7th day of November, 1882, and according to the returns they expressly declined to be represented by Mr. Manning on this floor. They do not want his services, and have said so in unmistakable terms.

I admit as a question of principle that the second district of Mississippi and every other district in the United States ought to be represented on the floor of Congress. But because a district ought to be represented is that any reason why this district or any other should be misrepresented upon this floor? If the one hundred and fifty or one hundred and sixty thousand people of the second district of Mississippi have retired Mr. Manning, have chosen another person to act for them as their Representative in the American Congress, is that any reason why the man whom they have repudiated should be permitted to come in here and take a seat?

But there is another ground. I was struck very forcibly by the remarks that were made in another part of the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER]. You will remember when the question was put to him by some gentleman on the other side whether if a man should come into this House and present his certificate and in the presence of this body and before he was sworn in should say that that certificate was obtained by fraud and was the result of corruption would he feel under obligation to seat that man upon that certificate, the distinguished gentleman from New York declared that he would. I am amazed that such a doctrine should be advocated here or anywhere else under the shining sun. Now what is the proposition in fact and in law upon which the opponents of the majority report have planted themselves and upon which they are compelled to plant themselves in the investigation and argument in this case? I will state it as I understand it. The sum and result of the argument of the defenders of the claim of Manning is crystallized in this single proposition, that a certificate of election regular in form, signed by the proper authority, is absolutely unassailable even though the holder, in the presence of the House and before he is sworn in, admits that it was issued in violation of law and is fraudulent and is the result and product of corrupt and criminal conspiracy, and that the House in such a case, with full knowledge of the facts, is compelled to swear in the holder upon this admittedly invalid and fraudulent paper.

That is the doctrine advocated by those who represent the minority upon the Committee of Elections. A man may come into this House, he may present before the members of this body a certificate and say, "Here is my certificate; it was born in sin and conceived and nurtured in iniquity; it is dripping all over with fraud; it is rotten with corruption; and I say this to you before I am sworn in." Yet the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] and others say that they would swear him in all the same.

I protest that such a doctrine as that is absolutely monstrous. Fraud vitiates every transaction; it invalidates every instrument of writing, every contract, and vacates and sets them aside. A fraud, when it is admitted and confessed, should receive prompt repudiation and condemnation at the hands of any tribunal the moment that fraud is discovered by the body to which it is presented.

I protest in the name of the honor and decency of the American Congress. The proposition advocated by the other side is shocking and offensive to the moral sense and intelligence of the American people, and yet they are driven to that position by the grounds they have taken in this matter.

I do not desire to further occupy the attention of this House, except to refer to one single other matter. A resolution has been offered by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN], by which he proposes to recommit this subject to the Committee of Elections with instructions to that committee to consider and determine the question whether a certificate has been issued to anybody, and, if so, to whom. This is a very extraordinary proceeding.

This House, after deliberation, after full consideration, almost unanimously agreed that the certificate of Mr. Manning and all the other papers in the case should go to the Committee on Elections. My friends on the other side say that although they were all referred, still the committee had no right to look at anything but the certificate. I ask what they were sent to the committee for? Was it for fun? Was it a farce? Was it to compel us to go through the examination of these papers from the beginning to end, deliberate upon them, and make our report thereon to this body, and then be kindly told that we had meddled with that which was none of our business?

My friend from Kentucky [Mr. ROBERTSON] said yesterday that any man who dared to consider these outside papers was a demagogue. That is a very grave charge to make against the three hundred and twenty-odd members of this House of the American Congress when it is remembered that they—not a part of them, but all of them—by the authority and consent of Manning himself, sent these papers to the committee, and demanded and commanded the committee to examine them and to report upon them.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Upon the prima facie case, and the prima facie case alone.

Mr. HART. "Upon the prima facie case," says my friend. Yes, sir; but we were to determine that not from one but from all the papers. Now, I can imagine that the gentleman must have very strange notions about the sacredness of some things, for if I remember rightly he said in substance yesterday—I notice that he has reserved his remarks for revision, but I hope he will not leave out that beautiful part of his speech—that this certificate was as good as though it had been drawn up by the angels and issued by Almighty God from the court of heaven.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I did not catch exactly what the gentleman said.

Mr. HART. Oh, well, read your speech, and you will see that what I have said is true.

I believe in giving to every instrument its full legal force and effect. But when a man comes into this body and informs us that the paper under which he claims title to a seat here was issued in fraud, by trampling upon law, by violating and disregarding the authority of the court, by trampling upon every sense of decency, equity, and justice, I do not care how well it is drawn, how accurate and solemn it is in form, I will never vote to seat a man on a paper like that, with such an admission in advance, so long as I have any regard for the purity and honor of the American Congress.

The people of this country are lovers of truth and fair play, and they will not countenance a doctrine which violates both and enthrones dishonesty and corruption in places of power and trust. To admit Mr. Manning now is to affirm and sanction the illegality and iniquity which lie at the bottom of this transaction. It gives encouragement to wrong and puts a stain upon the integrity of our proceedings.

But I have been drawn from the line which I was intending to pursue by the remark of my friend on the left. I said there was one other matter to which I wished to direct the attention of the House. That is the resolution for recommitment proposed by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN].

I said that the House had already ordered us to consider all the papers in this case. Now, when we have done our work; when we have reported to the House the result of our investigation and deliberation, it is solemnly proposed that we shall be sent back to our committee-room, that the House shall stultify itself, that the House shall take a backward step, undo what has been done, and impose upon the committee the performance of the mere duty of ascertaining whether a paper is right and correct on its face or not.

What is the object of this proposed recommittal? There can be but one object. The gentleman who introduced the resolution and every other member here must understand that by the terms of the resolution we are called upon simply to inquire whether or not that paper was issued by the governor of Mississippi and whether it is in the ordinary form. We are to be asked to go through that farce. And what for? It is, if possible, to suppress the facts that have been developed by the report of your committee and brought to the attention of this House. I can see no other purpose. It will not do; the facts will not be suppressed. The facts are before the House and before the country, and no recommittal of this question, no subterfuge which can be resorted to, no parliamentary tactics can hide from the American people the true condition of affairs; and upon that condition of affairs, as developed by this investigation, the people of this country will base their judgment.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HART] has twenty-five minutes remaining.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to give way for a motion to adjourn. It is now almost 5 o'clock, and we can not decide this case to-day.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I yield for that motion.

FRIDAY, February 15, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the 5th instant, copies of all papers on file in his Department relating to the case of Johnson Foster, a Creek Indian; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, communicating, in response to a resolution of the 12th instant, the cause of his delay in advising the Postmaster-General as to the proper construction of the act of March 3, 1883, in relation to the salaries and pay of postmasters; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

SUFFERERS BY THE OHIO OVERFLOW.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask leave of the Senate to present to it a telegraphic communication which I have received from Cincinnati in relation to the sufferings by the people there and the appropriation made by Congress a few days ago. I learn that further application will be made to Congress for the relief of the sufferers, and I desire to present this telegram in the nature of a petition and have it referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks leave to present a telegraphic dispatch from Cincinnati on the subject of the floods of the Ohio River and the suffering occasioned thereby and an appropriation by Congress for relief. If there be no objection, the paper will be received and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PENDLETON. I should like to have it read, as it is not long, if that is the pleasure of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Telegram.]

CINCINNATI, OHIO, February 14, 1884.

Hon. ISAAC M. JORDAN, Washington, D. C.:

Secretary War has taken hold in right way and is doing grandly. Red tape, which I most feared, has been cut and thrown away. River now seventy-one feet, with rise half-inch last hour. Weather turned cold. While this is better than rain, it increases suffering. Ohio Legislature has appropriated two hundred thousand. Congress should make an additional appropriation of one million. This must come, and the more promptly the better. The disheartening wrecks will most appear when water subsides. Neither pen nor imagination can sufficiently depict the distress that prevails, and the helping hand of Government must be stretched out to the unfortunate thousands in river towns. This is the almost universal sentiment of our people in the face of this terrible calamity. There are no politics, no sectionalism—nothing but a broad humanity. Within few days hundreds of thousands have been reduced from comparative comfort to destitution and despair, and these people need to feel that the Government cares for them. This would encourage them to begin new battle for existence. Go before Appropriation Committee and beg for prompt action, and these people and all friends of humanity will invoke the blessings of Heaven upon Congress. Far away as you are from these terrible scenes, and surrounded as you are by every comfort, you can have no idea of the prevailing distress.

RICHARD SMITH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations if there be no objection.

Mr. VOORHEES. When one year ago portions of Indiana were visited by a disastrous flood the Legislature of that State was in session; our people asked for nothing of the Federal Government, and would not now if the Legislature was in session or could be speedily convened. At that time not only large appropriations were made by the Legislature of Indiana, but likewise large, generous voluntary contributions to such an extent that thousands upon thousands of people destitute and suffering outside of the State were assisted by the liberality of our citizens. Voluntary aid societies were organized, and the work went on in a way that attracted the attention of the whole country to the generosity and ability of our people in that direction. At this time they are not idle in their voluntary contributions. At the same time, as the system has been entered upon of rendering aid by the Federal Government they ask for consideration in that respect. I therefore request that a dispatch received from the city of Richmond by my colleague and myself be read at the desk and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks that a communication on the same subject, the nature of which he has described, be read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Telegram.]

RICHMOND, IND., February 14, 1884.

DANIEL W. VOORHEES, BENJAMIN HARRISON, THOMAS M. BROWNE, Washington, D. C.:

Richmond appropriated $5,000, and a citizens' meeting adopted this:

Resolved, That our representatives in Congress be requested and urged to do all in their power to secure an appropriation as large as possible by Congress to aid the sufferers from the present flood in the Ohio River and its tributaries.

C. C. BINKLEY, Secretary.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Indiana, before he takes his seat, allow me to make a suggestion? I have received similar dispatches several mornings from different places in my State. The Secretary of War is now in the room of the Committee on Appropriations in consultation with the chairman and others. His assurances from the other end of the Capitol are that all he asks for will be granted to-day. He has now enough to last him until to-morrow night and perhaps Sunday, and we shall be able, if a resolution is sent us to-day, to do all he desires, and he will attend to it very promptly.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am very glad to have that assurance. I came to the Capitol this morning with the Secretary of War and was aware of the fact that he was before the Committee on Appropriations of the House and asked for an additional appropriation. I am very glad of the assurance of the Senator from Kentucky that it will be promptly attended to, and that a resolution will come from the House to-day.

Mr. BECK. The Secretary of War has just come in.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from West Virginia behind me [Mr. KENNA] assures me that the committee of the House has already agreed upon a further appropriation of $200,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Upon consultation with my colleague we concluded that the telegram which he has presented should be laid before the Senate, not simply for the reason that it contained a request, but for the information which it also contains that our people in those cities of the State which are not suffering in the overflow are themselves by their municipal bodies and by private contributions responding to the demands of their fellow-citizens who are in distress. I think there is a very general and a very liberal movement now on foot throughout our whole State, and that private benevolence is doing its utmost there to relieve extreme cases of distress in some of our Ohio River cities. I was glad to be informed this morning by the Secretary of War that one of our largest border cities but not one that has been suffering most, the city of Evansville, to which place he had telegraphed a thousand dollars for immediate relief, had declined his offer and had expressed themselves as able to take care of their own people.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the paper will be received and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of W. H. Deaver and 17 others, Union soldiers of the last war, praying Congress to extend the time for filing claims for additional bounty under the act of July 28, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL presented a petition of the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children, praying for an appropriation to carry out the objects of that association; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SLATER. I present a statement in relation to Senate bills No. 511, No. 655, and No. 810, all upon the same subject-matter, relating to relief for the States of Oregon, Nevada, and California, which I move be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SLATER presented a petition of the State Temperance Alliance of Oregon, officially signed, representing 10,000 members, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for drinking purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. PALMER presented two resolutions adopted by the common council of Negaunee, Mich., remonstrating against the proposed forfeiture of the land grant in aid of the construction of the Marquette, Houghton and Ontonagon Railroad; which were referred to the Committe on Public Lands.

Mr. PLUMB. I have received from a lady in Kansas a petition, numerously signed by women of that State, requesting the passage of what is known as the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution, giving to women the right of suffrage. I present the petition, and move that it be referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I present a memorial of 104 settlers and owners of Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, protesting against the passage of the bill (S. 559) to quiet the title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes. The bill is before the Committee on Public Lands, and I move the reference of the memorial to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. I present the petition of Silas Prather and 1,100 others, settlers on certain lands in the Territory of Washington, praying that they be protected in their title and occupancy of said lands in the controversy which has arisen between them and the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 1049) for the relief of Henry H. Woodward, of Oregon;

A bill (S. 644) for the relief of the administrator of the estate of John W. Dear, deceased;

A bill (S. 921) for the relief of Elijah Crudgington; and

A bill (S. 1107) for the relief of John A. Knowles.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 899) to provide promotion in the corps of judge-advocates, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. 1541) to provide promotion in the corps of judge-advocates; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1103) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of William H. Fenton, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 922) for the relief of John Gibson, to report it adversely. This claimant has his remedy under the act of August 7, 1882, to remove the charge of desertion from certain soldiers of the Army; the evidence that was filed before the Secretary of War was not in the opinion of your committee sufficient, and he still has his remedy before that tribunal. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 859) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of John Shanks, to report it adversely. It comes under the act of of August 7, 1882. I move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am instructed by the same committee to whom was referred the bill (S. 858) to remove the charge of absence without proper authority from the military record of Richard H. White and to revoke the order of dismissal from the service therefor, to report it adversely, and to move that the bill be indefinitely postponed. The whole record is given, and the reasons for the action of the committee, in the report.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 51) authorizing an expenditure of money for Indian educational purposes, have instructed me to report it with amendments. I desire to ask, after the conclusion of morning business, the indulgence of the Senate a few moments for the passage of the joint resolution, which has become necessary from some difficulty in the Departments in the construction of existing law.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1232) authorizing claimants to the Rancho de Napa, in Napa County, California, to prove up their title, reported it without amendment.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 209) to establish a United States court in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to say in connection with the bill which has just been reported that a minority of the committee dissent from the views of the majority as to some of the provisions of the bill. It is believed by some of us that the jurisdiction which is conferred by the bill on the United States court to be established in that Territory is wider than our treaties with the tribes in the Indian Territory will justify. Perhaps while there may be reasons urged why the jurisdiction should be as wide as is given by the bill, yet it has seemed to some of us that it was in conflict with the treaties in some of their provisions, and we have therefore reserved our right to be heard against those provisions on the floor.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 949) to amend and correct an act approved January 29, 1879, authorizing the appointment of Dr. Junius L. Powell an assistant surgeon in the United States Army, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1412) authorizing the Secretary of War to adjust and settle the accounts for arms between the State of South Carolina and the Government of the United States; and

A bill (S. 1413) to empower the Secretary of War to audit the claim of the State of South Carolina for rent alleged to be due for the use and occupation of the Citadel Academy, at Charleston.

Mr. HAMPTON. A report was made by the Committee on Military Affairs a short time ago, and I find that there was some informality in the proceedings of the committee. I therefore ask unanimous consent that that bill be recommitted to the committee. It is the bill (S. 445) for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of Robert J. Baugness, deceased.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally adversely; and they were indefinitely postponed:

A bill (S. 1166) for the relief of certain officers who have served a specified number of years as captains or as company and regimental staff officers; and

A bill (S. 1217) for the relief of certain officers who have served a specified number of years as captains or as company and regimental staff officers.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William Logan, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1404) to authorize the location of a branch home for volunteer disabled soldiers in either the States of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 807) for the relief of John H. Shugart and Robert F. Shugart, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bill and joint resolution, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill (S. 1394) for the relief of the trustees of the Southern Illinois Normal University, at Carbondale, Jackson County, Illinois; and Joint resolution (S. R. 38) authorizing the issue of clothing to Sergt. Herman Theune, Company I, Twenty-third New York Infantry.

TELEGRAPHIC-SERVICE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I am instructed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to report back the resolution submitted by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL] on the 13th instant providing for the payment of certain expenses out of the appropriation "for expenses of special and select committees," &c.

Mr. HILL. I ask that the resolution may be acted upon now.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the necessary expenses incurred under resolutions of the Senate of January 31 and February 11, 1884, be paid out of the appropriation "for expenses of special and select committees," &c., on vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report the resolution, with amendments, providing for printing additional copies of the report of the Select Committee of the United States Senate on the Mississippi River Improvements, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment reported by the committee will be read.

Mr. HAWLEY. If there be unanimous consent it is not worth while to act severally upon all these little verbal amendments. I will state in short that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] presented the resolution as a concurrent resolution to have 2,000 copies printed, but we thought that it would go then to the other House and go upon the Calendar there and we might not get it. The object is speed. So the committee strikes out "two" and puts in "one," which comes within the limitation of the rules and can be ordered directly by the Senate. We can get the reports in that way; otherwise the matter may be delayed indefinitely. The same number is provided for the Senate as was intended by the resolution originally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendments will be reported together.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the first line it is proposed to strike out "two" and insert "one" before "thousand;" in line 3, after the word "printed," to strike out "one-half;" and in the last line to strike out "and one-half for the use of the House of Representatives;" so as to make the resolution, when amended, read:

Resolved, That 1,000 additional copies of the report of the Select Committee of the United States Senate on the Mississippi River Improvements be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

TARIFF COMPILATION OF 1884.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 53) authorizing the printing and binding of additional copies of the tariff compilation of 1884, to report it with an amendment, making it a concurrent resolution instead of a joint resolution, recommending its passage in that form, and asking for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? If there be no objection, the joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read at length.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print and bind 12,000 additional copies of the Tariff Compilation for 1884 (Senate Report, No. 12, Forty-eighth Congress, first session); 4,000 for the use of the Senate and 8,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment recommended by the Committee on Printing will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the title, and in the enacting clause to strike out the word "and," after "Senate," and insert "the;" and after the word "Representatives" to strike out the words "of the United States of America in Congress assembled" and to insert "concurring;" so as to read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring).

Mr. ANTHONY. This amendment is reported in conformity with the uniform custom of the Senate, a custom which I found when I came to the Committee on Printing of ordering printing by a concurrent resolution, but it has always seemed to me that it was unconstitutional, because the Constitution says:

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States.

I have spoken to some of the lawyers of the Senate on this subject, among others to the Senator who now adorns the chair and whose law I may say I have generally found to meet my approbation except on naval matters, but they are all against me, and I yield to authority but not to conviction. It seems to me that it is not constitutional to order printing except by joint resolution, but the custom has been universal, going back I believe to the origin of the Government, and we have proposed to amend the joint resolution in conformity therewith.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator who reported the joint resolution what will be the probable cost of this printing? I do not think the 12,000 copies will be enough; they will not meet the demand of the people who desire information on the subject.

Mr. ANTHONY. The printing proposed will cost between three and four thousand dollars.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think we ought to have twice the number reported in the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. The cost will be $3,470, according to the estimate of the Public Printer.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is an extensive public document and a very valuable one, and I move to strike out "12,000" and insert "24,000," and in the division to give to the Senate 8,000 and the House 16,000 copies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee amending the enacting clause which has been reported, after which the Chair will receive the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. INGALLS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, and that is whether the force of a concurrent and a joint resolution is the same on their passage through Congress; that is to say, whether a concurrent resolution must be read three times before it passes?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks according to the practice of the Senate a concurrent resolution need not be read three times.

Mr. INGALLS. But a joint resolution must be read three times. It is in exactly the same parliamentary position as a bill. I would suggest, therefore, that serious inconvenience will result in the journalization of this transaction if the committee report that a joint resolution shall take the form of a concurrent resolution. I do not see how that can be done by amendment. It changes the entire nature of the bill or paper that is introduced. It seems to me that the resolution ought to be originally either joint or concurrent, and that by report of a committee or by subsequent action of the Senate at any stage a joint resolution can not be changed by amendment into a concurrent resolution. I submit that to the Senator from Rhode Island for his consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the joint resolution as introduced must until amended be considered as in Committee of the Whole, and he so directed, where it now is; but the Chair thinks that it is in the power of the Senate to amend the enacting clause which fixes the nature of the resolution, and having amended the enacting clause it has changed the character and nature of the proposition before the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Then what becomes of the joint resolution, which must be read three times before it can pass, and which is now in Committee of the Whole?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will have been amended out of existence in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. INGALLS. But then a concurrent resolution does not require to be considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; but this is not yet a concurrent resolution. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee, amending the enacting clause so as to make it a concurrent instead of a joint resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] now moves to amend the resolution. The amendment proposed by him will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 4 it is proposed to strike out the word "twelve" and insert "twenty-four;" and in line 7 to strike out "four" and insert "eight;" and in the same line to strike out "eight" and insert "sixteen;" so as to read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print and bind 24,000 additional copies of the tariff compilation for 1884 (Senate Report No. 12, Forty-eighth Congress, first session); 8,000 for the use of the Senate and 16,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing and the chairman of the Committee on Finance if this is the report which was prepared by order of the Finance Committee under the charge of Mr. Durfee, the clerk of that committee?

Mr. MORRILL. I so understand it.

Mr. BECK. Then it is an extremely valuable book, and we can hardly get too many copies of it. I think the chairman of the Finance Committee will agree with me in that statement from the examination he has made of it.

Mr. MORRILL. I have already stated as much to the Senate when I introduced originally the resolution. This volume contains all the tariff and a great many other valuable tables and documents in relation to the tariff. In addition to that it will have an index, so that the wayfaring man can find any subject that he is looking for.

Mr. INGALLS. Is the resolution now in Committee of the Whole or before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. INGALLS. But a concurrent resolution can not be in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not yet a concurrent resolution, as the action of the Committee of the Whole is not final. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If no further amendment be proposed it will be reported to the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A joint resolution authorizing the printing and binding of additional copies of the Tariff Compilation of 1884."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate having made two amendments thereto, the question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. If there be no objection, the Chair will put the question together on concurring in the amendments.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution, which is now a concurrent resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

WILLIAM PFAENDER.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I observe in the proceedings of the 13th instant an adverse report from the Committee on Military Affairs upon the bill (S. 1053) for the relief of William Pfaender. I have consulted with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] who made the report to the Senate, and with his consent I submit a motion, and ask unanimous consent that the report be reconsidered and the bill recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the bill on the Calendar?

Mr. MCMILLAN. No, sir; it was postponed indefinitely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order for the Senator to move, as two actual sessions have not yet gone by, to reconsider the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Then I submit that motion.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs. That order will be entered if there be no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 3934) relating to recoveries for infringements of patents; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 160) making further appropriations for the relief of destitute persons in the districts overflowed by the Ohio River and its tributaries.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 2555) to change the name of "The National La Fayette and Bank of Commerce" to that of "The National La Fayette Bank;" and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

SUFFERERS BY THE OHIO OVERFLOW.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask the Senator from Iowa the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in view of the circumstances surrounding us, which will not admit of a moment's delay, whether it would not be better to call up the measure which has just come from the House of Representatives making an additional appropriation for the relief of the sufferers in the Ohio and Mississippi valleys?

Mr. ALLISON. In response to the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana I will say that I think the joint resolution had better go to the Committee on Appropriations. We shall hold a meeting during the morning hour and consider it and report it back during the day in some form.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is satisfactory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. According to the view of the Chair under the present rules bills from the House of Representatives can not be laid before the Senate except at the beginning of the session each day, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS. I rise for the purpose of suggesting to the Senator from Indiana that he ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the Chair may now lay before the Senate the joint resolution that has just come from the House of Representatives, in order that it may be referred to the Committee on Appropriations at this time.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will make that request unless the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations or some member of that committee should recommend a different course. I agree with the Senator from Tennessee, and I will make the request that unanimous consent be given to the Chair to lay before the Senate the joint resolution indicated for reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that there be now laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. Res. 160) making further appropriations for the relief of destitute persons in the districts overflowed by the Ohio River and its tributaries. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 160) making further appropriations for the relief of destitute persons in the districts overflowed by the Ohio River and its tributaries was read the first time by its title.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear it read at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to present and have referred, to accompany that bill, a statement made by the Paymaster-General or under his direction in regard to this subject, and I wish to call the particular attention of the Committee on Military Affairs to it. This bill carries out the recommendation of the Secretary of War, and the Paymaster-General concurs in the view of the Secretary that it ought to pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. INGALLS in the chair). The paper will be received and referred with the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 1557) for the relief of Abraham Brafman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (S. 1558) to protect innocent purchasers of patented articles was read the first time by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to have that bill read at length, inasmuch as I understood the Senator from Indiana to say he proposed to offer it as a substitute for a bill which will soon be reached.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read in extenso.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That it shall be a valid defense to any action for an infringement of any patent, or any suit or proceeding to enjoin any person from the use of a patented article, that the defendant therein, or his assignor, purchased the patented article for use or consumption, and not for sale or exchange, in good faith and in the usual course of trade, without notice that the same was covered by a patent, or without notice that the seller had no right to sell such article; and in all such cases notice received after such purchase shall not have the effect to impair in any way the right of such purchaser as absolute owner.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. PIKE, it was Ordered, That L. Madison Day be permitted to take from the files of the Senate his written brief in the matter of his claim against the United States.

INDIAN EDUCATIONAL APPROPRIATION.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent to call up for consideration now the joint resolution reported from the Committee on Appropriations this morning. I think it will take but a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. INGALLS in the chair). The Senator from Massachusetts asks for the consideration at this time of a joint resolution reported to-day from the Committee on Appropriations, which will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution (S. R. 51) authorizing an expenditure of money for Indian educational purposes.

It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to expend so much of the sum of $150,000 appropriated for the purpose of further instructing and civilizing Indian children dwelling west of the Mississippi River, &c., in an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes," approved May 17, 1882, as he may deem necessary, for the purpose of erecting and repairing such school buildings as are now in course of construction or for which contracts have been made, and for such other educational purposes as he may consider proper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs whether this money is to go to the day schools or boarding schools.

Mr. DAWES. I will state, if there is no objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution, the difficulty in reference to the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The question is on the amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. DAWES. I will answer directly the question of the Senator from Missouri and then send to the Secretary's desk a letter which will explain the necessity of this resolution. No part of this resolution will have the effect of maintaining a day school on the reservations or anything of that kind. The difficulty arises out of the construction put upon the appropriation of 1882. It authorized the Department of the Interior, as they supposed, to erect a school building, among the other expenditures. They went on with the plan of that building, and a portion of the expenditure had been allowed, two quarters of it, at the Treasury Department, when the First Comptroller of the Treasury came to the conclusion that the terms of the appropriation were not broad enough for the purpose of erecting a school building in Lawrence, Kans., and although they went on to expend money upon the faith of the construction first put upon the act and upon the allowance of the expenditures for two quarters, the accounts for the continuing expenditure have been suspended because the Comptroller came to the conclusion that the law was not broad enough to cover such an expenditure. Thus they are in this embarrassment, which will be more fully explained in the letter which I send to the desk and ask may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the communication sent to the desk by the Senator from Massachusetts will be read by the Chief Clerk.

Mr. DAWES. Then I shall have the original statute read and we shall see the difficulty.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 9, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of a communication of the 8th instant from your committee, inclosing a copy of S. R. 51, being a "joint resolution authorizing an expenditure of money for Indian educational purposes," and requesting certain information on the subject; also my views regarding the advisability and necessity of the passage of the resolution.

The money the expenditure of which is authorized by the resolution is a portion of the $150,000 appropriated by the act of May 17, 1882 (22 Statutes, 86), for the purpose of further instructing and civilizing Indian children dwelling west of the Mississippi River, &c.

This appropriation was decided by the First Comptroller of the Treasury on May 26, 1883, to be a permanent specific appropriation.

Under and in pursuance of what this Department deemed to be within the scope and the meaning and intent of the provisions of that law, plans were prepared, proposals invited, and contract made and approved June 30, 1883, for the erection of buildings near Lawrence, Kans., at a cost of $45,419, for the establishment of a school for the educational and industrial training of Indian children, payment specified to be made from the appropriation under consideration.

The accounts for the first and second installments for work done under said contract, amounting in all to $14,139.90, were approved here, and passed for payment by the accounting officers of the Treasury, but payment of the third installment due under said contract, amounting to $12,011.29, is withheld by the accounting officers, who, I am verbally informed, now hold that the appropriation specified can not be used for the erection of buildings for Indian school purposes where an industrial school has not already been established and supported wholly from treaty or other funds appropriated by Congress. No such school having heretofore existed at Lawrence, Kans., they hold that the account can not be passed for payment.

Under that appropriation a contract has also been made for the erection of buildings for industrial-school purposes at Albuquerque, N. Mex., at a cost of $29,700.

An industrial school has heretofore been and is now in operation at that point, but increased school facilities are greatly needed for the Indians located in that section of the country. Thus far there has been no question with the accounting officers as to the applicability of the appropriation to the erection of the buiInings at Albuquerque; but I will add that no claim for any part of the money under the last-mentioned contract has yet been presented for payment, and therefore it is not certainly known what view the accounting officers will take regarding it.

The citizens of Lawrence donated to the Government two hundred and eighty acres of valuable land, adjoining that city, as a site for the buildings and farming land for the school purposes. The citizens of Albuquerque donated sixty-five acres near that city for the purposes of the school at that point.

It is the amount, $75,119, involved in the contract for the erection of Indian industrial-school buildings at those two points that is specially covered by the joint resolution.

The state of the appropriation at the present time is about as follows:

Whole amount appropriated		$150,000
Amount expended for the general purposes specified in the law about	$51,650
Amount of contract for buildings at Lawrence, Kans	45,419
Amount of contract for buildings at Albuquerque, N. Mex	29,700
Total amount of expenditures and obligations under contracts		126,679
Leaving a balance of about		23,321

The buildings at Lawrence are now about completed, and, as the Department has been unable to make the payments for the work as provided in the contract owing to the decision finally reached on the matter by the accounting officers, there is urgent necessity for the passage of the resolution, and early action thereon by the Congress is respectfully recommended.

The copy of the resolution is herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

H. M. TELLER, Secretary.

To the CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
United States Senate.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Missouri will observe that this is for schools outside of the Indian reservations, and therefore does not affect the question of the wisdom of day schools, which I think, perhaps, the Senator and I would not differ about. The original appropriation is somewhat involved in its language. It came in this shape in the statute through a committee of conference, and by putting together several items the phraseology became so involved that there is a fair question upon which the accounting officers of the Treasury at one time entertained one opinion and allowed the accounts, and afterward came to a different conclusion and left the accounts for the money already expended at Albuquerque, N. Mex., and at Lawrence, Kans., in the construction and repair of those buildings unpaid, which makes this resolution necessary. I ask the Secretary now to read the language of the appropriation, which I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And for the purpose of further instructing and civilizing Indian children dwelling west of the Mississippi River, and in the States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan, and not belonging to the five civilized tribes in the Indian Territory, or so many thereof as may be practicable in industrial schools other than those at Carlisle, Hampton, and Forest Grove, supported in whole or in part from treaty and other funds appropriated by Congress, or such as may be established and supported wholly from treaty or other funds so appropriated and for purchasing stock for herding purposes for such industrial schools, and also for the placing of such children, with the consent of their parents, under the care and control of such suitable white families as may in all respects be qualified to give such children moral, industrial, and educational training, for a term of not less than three years, under arrangements in which their proper care, support, and education shall be in exchange for their labor, the sum of $150,000 is hereby appropriated, to be expended under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the Committee on Appropriations will be now read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations is, in line 14, after word "erecting," to insert "furnishing;" so as to read:

As he may deem necessary for the purpose of erecting, furnishing, and repairing such school buildings, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in lines 16 and 17, to strike out the words:

And for such other educational purposes as he may consider proper.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I suppose this resolution will have to pass, but as one member of the Committee on Appropriations I am obliged to say that it does not meet my approbation. I do not believe there was anything in the original law that authorized the diversion, as I think it was, of this $150,000 to the erection of school buildings anywhere. It was originally a Senate amendment to the bill that was approved May 17, 1882, and as it passed the Senate the amendment read thus:

And the Secretary of the Interior is further authorized and directed to provide for the care, support, and education of all Indian children dwelling west of the Mississippi and not belonging to the five civilized tribes in the Indian Territory, or so many thereof as may be practicable, under such regulations as may be approved by the President, in any of the States or Territories, at a cost not exceeding $200 per annum for each child; and for this purpose there is appropriated $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

In the conference committee it was changed to the language read by the Senator from Massachusetts, or by the Secretary at his request. In that I am still unable to see that authority was given to the Secretary of the Interior to erect a new building costing $45,000 at Lawrence, Kans., or to erect a new building—if he has done so; I did not hear distinctly about that—at Albuquerque, N. Mex. He has done it, however; and the bills for the expense involved are now before him unpaid. The Comptroller of the Treasury first seemed to allow him to do this, but now refuses. The reason I withhold my assent from the joint resolution is that I regard it as a diversion of money, that was not intended for that purpose, by the Secretary of the Interior to the erection of school buildings that we did not give him any authority to contract for. The very next line of the bill following those read by the Secretary on the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts is:

For the erection of a school building on the Northern Cheyenne and Arapaho reservation, in the Indian Territory, to replace the one destroyed by fire, $5,000.

Wherever we have authorized the erection of a building we have appropriated the money specifically for that purpose. We did so after long debate in regard to a building to be erected in Nebraska over which a long wrangle was had. Now, if the Secretary of the Interior can divert the money given for the purpose of educating the Indians under provisions as broad as the conference saw fit to place in lieu of that passed by the Senate, he can devote any other fund appropriated to Indians to any purpose. I have no doubt he has erected a good building at Lawrence, Kans. I see by the papers the people there gave a large amount of valuable land as a gift to have it done; but $45,000 for an Indian school seems to me to be an immense sum of money for the purpose, and $29,000 at Albuquerque also seems like a large sum.

But that is not the question. My point is that unless clear provisions of law authorize the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to use the money in the erection of buildings, however desirable he may regard them, he has not any right to do it. Congress did not intend by any of these provisions to give him that authority; and whenever we consent that our executive officers shall take authority we do not give and divert the use of the money we appropriate from the purpose for which we intended it to another purpose, however laudable and however desirable it may seem to them, then Congress loses all its control over the appropriations, and the executive officers become our masters and not our servants. That is the case here as I understand it. I doubt whether any member of the committee will say that it was intended at that time that any part of the money thus given, even under the broad language of the conference committee's report, was intended to be given so as to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to pay $45,000 for an Indian school-house to be built anywhere. I believe in the condition of things as it exists we shall have to pay the money, but I enter my protest against that way of carrying out our laws by our executive officers.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, it is perhaps not improper that I should make some statement about this provision of the law and how it came to be in the law in the form in which it is found there.

The Senator from Kentucky will remember, as all the other members of the Senate will, the controversy that existed about appropriations for educating the Indians. He will remember the somewhat lengthy and very instructive debate on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] calling for the appropriation I think of $3,000,000 for that purpose. The sentiment of the Senate seemed to be largely in favor of giving some very considerable sum in addition to what had been already given for that purpose, and generally I think the feeling was that that sum should be $500,000. My impression is that originally the Senate voted to make it $500,000; at all events a very much larger sum than the House would agree to; and as the result of an extended conference, I think of repeated conferences, the sum was finally fixed at $150,000, added to what had theretofore been appropriated. It was designed to use this sum of money in doing something entirely different, in a different place, and in a different way from what had ever been done in regard to Indian education; and the design of the amendment was that no portion of this money should be appropriated to the maintenance of any school then existing, but that it should take up the Indian education from a new standpoint and in new places and in new ways and for the accomplishment of the enlarged purposes which had been in the mind of Congress in appropriating the money and giving the direction about its expenditure.

As the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has said, the language of the clause was changed from time to time by the conference committee to meet differing views and accommodate different ideas until it finally reached the shape in which it went into the statute, but it was punctuated wrong; and while the intention was plain, and I think now the plain reading of the language employed is that this money should only be appropriated for new schools, the Comptroller when it was submitted to him held that it meant exactly the opposite; that it could not be used for any school except an old school; that is to say, one already existing and one already under the patronage of the Government. Under that construction he permitted the application of a portion of this money for a school at Albuquerque, which was an old school; that is to say, he permitted the appropriation of a portion of it to the enlargement of that school. By some mistake, as he claims, he also passed the first vouchers for the building at Lawrence.

While I am on that point I will say that I have been advised by the Interior Department that the question of construction came up after the law was passed, and for the purpose of knowing what should be done the advice of the Comptroller was taken on the question as to whether this money could be used for erecting school buildings. I remember the Secretary of the Interior having stated to me the doubt that arose in his own mind as to what should be done.

I am happy to agree entirely with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] in his criticism upon the Departments generally for their enlargement of the powers we give them in the appropriation of money. I shall be very glad to do all I can to put a check upon them. But this has grown up from time to time, one thing added to another, until departmental constructions have almost the force of law, and all the Departments of the Government being required to deal with the Treasury Department about these matters, take the direction of the Treasury Department as practically conclusive upon them. In this same law there is found this item:

For support of industrial schools and for other educational purposes for the Indian tribes, $150,000.

That is an appropriation which has been in the Indian bills for several years in almost that exact language, the difference being only in the amount appropriated, and under that the entire system of Indian schools upon reservations has been carried on, including the erection of buildings, the furnishing of buildings, the repair of buildings, as well as the pay of teachers, and all the incidental expenses of the schools. All that has been done under language of that kind; and consequently this is no new thing. The Treasury Department first applied to the portion of the statute now under consideration precisely the same construction in effect that they had applied before to similar language employed in the appropriation of money for the education of the Indians.

I am glad that the Senator from Kentucky has called attention to this matter.

Mr. BECK. I think the Senator from Kansas will find that whatever may have been done in that line before under such general appropriations was under treaty obligations, because we bound ourselves by treaty to maintain and support and keep up the schools.

Mr. PLUMB. But the treaty obligation to build a school-house does not enlarge the functions of the language used in the appropriation of money. If we are bound to build a school-house on an Indian reservation and we appropriate money for the employment of teachers, the fact of the existence of the treaty obligation does not give more powers to the language used in appropriating the money; and it is under a similar provision to this that the whole system of Indian education has gone on and the entire system of the construction and maintenance of school buildings and their repair from time to time has gone on; and so the Senator will find in another item of this same bill:

For support of Indian industrial school at Forest Grove, Oreg., $30,000.

There is a sum of money appropriated for the support of that school, $30,000, and that is used for the purpose of repairing the building, although nothing is said about repairs. I think that covers this. Inasmuch as this matter has now been called to the attention of the Senate, the committee hereafter will find it convenient, as it certainly will be proper and in the interest of good legislation and good government, that there shall be some restriction put for the future upon this matter. But as it is now this practice has gone on from time to time, and this is only an incident which would not have attracted notice but for the fact that some question arose about the construction of this provision after the contract had been made and after a portion of the work had been paid for, which caused it to be referred to the Attorney-General for his opinion, and he decided, as I should say myself correctly, that this money could not be used for the purpose of erecting a building, and so a stop was put to any further action in that direction. This resolution becomes necessary in order to protect the Government property from loss and in order to carry out the honest obligation of the Government to the contractor.

Mr. BECK. Before the Senator sits down let me say one additional word. This appropriation is found in a law with this title: "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes," which was approved May 17, 1882; and the provision under which all these proceedings are had is a part of that bill, not distinguished in any regard from the ordinary provisions of it, and yet the Secretary tells us in the letter laid before us that—

This appropriation was decided by the First Comptroller of the Treasury on May 26, 1883, to be a permanent specific appropriation.

Mr. DAWES. What he means by that I suppose to be that it does not lapse into the Treasury at the close of the year.

Mr. BECK. Perhaps he does, but it is a very broad way of stating it.

Mr. DAWES. It is not a good term to use, but that must be what it means.

Mr. BECK. Continuing, he says:

Under and in pursuance of what this Department deemed to be within the scope and the meaning and intent of the provisions of that law, plans were prepared, proposals invited, and contract made and approved June 30, 1883, for the erection of buildings near Lawrence, Kans., at a cost of $45,419, for the establishment of a school for the educational and industrial training of Indian children, payment specified to be made from the appropriation under consideration.

The whole proceeding was postponed until the last day of the fiscal year for which the appropriation was made, and the contract was made on the 30th of June to bring it inside of the year. That does not look quite well, and therefore it was that I called attention to it as being in a form that I did not like. I do not mean to oppose the passage of the resolution; I think the thing has gone too far for that; but if it will induce the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs to say to the Department to be very careful hereafter, I shall have accomplished something.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUFFERERS BY THE OHIO OVERFLOW.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Appropriations the joint resolution (H. Res. 160) making further appropriations for the relief of destitute sufferers in the districts overflowed by the Ohio River and its tributaries. I ask that it may be put upon its passage at once.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. PENDLETON. In rising I have, of course, no intention of opposing this resolution. I merely rise for the purpose of stating that the Legislature of Ohio, now in session, has appropriated $200,000 for this purpose and is considering the propriety of making a larger appropriation. I desire also to say that no portion of the funds contributed by the Federal Government is expected to go to relieve the suffering people in the city of Cincinnati or its immediate vicinity. The people of that city, with great liberality, have taken care of all who are suffering there, and are prepared to do the work freely. This appropriation is to be applied to other cities and localities along the Ohio River which are not so able to take care of themselves.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PORTRAITS IN SENATE CHAMBER.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That no paintings or portraits be placed upon the walls of the Senate Chamber.

JOHN LEATHERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first bill on the Calendar will now be stated.

The bill (S. 253) for the relief of John Leathers was announced as first in order.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] who reported the bill is not in. I suggest that it lie over informally until he returns.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be laid aside informally to be resumed again. Suppose the Senator from Oregon does not return by 2 o'clock; does the Senator from Kansas ask that it retain its place on the Calendar?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be laid aside to retain its place at the head of the list for to-morrow unless sooner reached to-day. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

CRIMINAL JURISDICTION IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 243) to provide for the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon the United States in places out of their territory and dominion, and to repeal the Revised Statutes from section 4083 to section 4130, inclusive.

Mr. PENDLETON. That bill, I think, can not fairly be considered under the five-minute limitation of debate under Rule VIII. I am extremely anxious, however, that it shall not lose its place in the consideration of the Senate, and I ask to be advised by the Chair whether if it goes over—I do not say now whether I object to it myself—it will take the head of the Calendar, to be called at 2 o'clock, subject to the Senate bills 167 and 399.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will stand the third bill on the Calendar of General Orders under the ninth rule.

Mr. PENDLETON. I then ask that it may go over under that rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

JOHN LEATHERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was announced by its title.

Mr. CONGER. I see the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] is now in the Chamber; why not take up his bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Oregon that the bill (S. 253) for the relief of John Leathers was laid aside informally until the return of the Senator.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask that the bill be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 253) for the relief of John Leathers.

Mr. DOLPH. I have made all the suggestions I desire to make in regard to the matter.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that inasmuch as the report he made contains a statement of facts that is not consistent with the true state of affairs, the bill had better be recommitted in order to keep the record in a satisfactory condition. It appears from the report made by the Senator from Oregon that this man was indicted for fishing upon an Indian reservation; the language of the Senator in in his report relative to a former report is:

The facts are correctly stated in that report, which is as follows:

It appears from his statement yesterday that the statement in that report is not correct; that as a matter of fact the defendant was indicted for trading upon an Indian reservation; and it still further appears that he was wrongfully indicted for that; that he did not trade upon an Indian reservation; that he was indicted for an offense that never was committed before a court that never had jurisdiction, and that therefore the fine and the costs were unjustly imposed upon him. If the court had no jurisdiction, then the proceedings, as the Senator knows, were void ab initio, and the imposition of the costs upon Mr. Leathers was unjust, and they should be remitted to him with the fine that was unjustly imposed. Inasmuch as those facts nowhere appear, I would suggest that the better plan would be to recommit the bill, and have the facts appear in a report to come from the committee that shall set forth the situation exactly as it was.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I do not think the bill ought to be recommitted. No matter how the facts are stated in the report, they are now fully and completely set forth in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The report of the Committee on Claims now before the Senate does not adopt the report made by the committee at the last Congress. The mistake of fact was made by the former committee.

Mr. INGALLS. Do I understand the Senator to say that the committee at this session do not adopt the report made at the last session?

Mr. DOLPH. No, sir; they set it forth, and may say that the facts are correctly stated; as to the facts they may adopt it, but not as to the law in the case. They merely set forth that report as a matter of information, and place the merits of the case, the right of this claimant to relief, entirely upon the ground that the pardon was a proper exercise of executive clemency, that it came too late to avail the party because the money had been collected and covered into the Treasury; and they report that because the man was properly pardoned and the money is in the Treasury Congress ought to grant the relief.

As I stated yesterday, I was drawn inadvertently into my statement when this matter first came up for discussion that this man was indicted for fishing on the Indian reservation by the fact that some nine persons were indicted for fishing in Pyramid Lake on the reservation, and the papers in all the cases were mingled together, petitions for the pardon of this man and the nine others and all the correspondence were found together among the papers before the Committee on Claims. The cases were all presented to the President together.

That also accounts for the inadvertence of the former committee in stating that this man was one of those indicted for fishing on this reservation; but now the facts all being before the Senate and printed in the RECORD, and it appearing that this man was indicted for being found within the limits of an Indian reservation and trading there, when in fact his place of residence was not within the limits of the reservation as the boundary had been staked out on the ground and he had good reason to suppose he was without the limits of the reservation, his case having been presented to the President for pardon and a pardon granted and the material facts not being disputed, I do not think it necessary to refer the bill back.

The incorrectness of the former report, which is embodied in the report of the present committee, does not affect the merits of the case. Unless the reading of a report is called for it does not go into the RECORD. But, as I have said, this case is now correctly stated in the RECORD, and I see no reason why we should longer discuss the proposition to refund to this claimant these $500 which have been so unjustly taken from him. I am aware that if the court proceeded without jurisdiction the United States has no legal claim to the money; but there is no way to get it out of the Treasury unless Congress takes action in regard to the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. INGALLS. I would ask the Senator from Oregon if he thinks, if the court had no jurisdiction and the proceedings were absolutely void ab initio, the amendment of the committee should be agreed to, retaining the costs that were imposed upon the defendant? It seems to me obvious that he would be entitled to have the entire amount refunded if he was wrongfully indicted before a court that had no jurisdiction.

Mr. DOLPH. I think so, too, and I suppose the amendment was only proposed by the committee out of regard for the report of the former committee. The committee believed that it would be at least equitable to refund to this man the money collected from him which was in the Treasury, although he was required to lose the costs paid by him which had been expended by the United States in the case. If the Senate desires not to concur in the amendment and to pass the bill as it was introduced, I have no objection. I think it would be right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the first amendment of the Committee on Claims reducing the sum to be appropriated from $744.90 to $501.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the second amendment of the committee, in line 8, after the word "fine," to strike out "and costs."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PATENT INFRINGEMENT SUITS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 1115) to amend section 4919 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the recovery of damages for the infringement of patents.

Mr. PLATT. It is manifest that we can do nothing in the consideration of this bill this morning, and I think it too important a bill to be considered under the five-minute rule. As I understand it, an objection will place the bill very near the head of the Calendar, to be proceeded with after 2 o'clock. I will object to the consideration of the bill under the eighth rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

PRESENTS TO NAVAL OFFICERS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. 42) authorizing certain officers of the Navy to accept presents from foreign powers. It proposes to authorize Rear-Admiral J. W. A. Nicholson, of the Navy, to accept the medal which has been conferred upon him by the King of Sweden and Norway; Rear-Admiral R. W. Shufeldt, of the Navy, to accept a sword, Persian carpet, and other articles presented to him by the Sultan of Zanzibar; and Rear-Admiral C. H. Baldwin, of the Navy, to accept a gold box with a portrait of the Emperor of Russia set in diamonds, presented by the emperor on the occasion of his coronation at Moscow.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIJAH W. PENNY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 544) granting an increase of pension to Elijah W. Penny.

Mr. HARRISON. As that bill is reported adversely and there are but two or three minutes left, I will make the objection formally that it may remain on the Calendar and come up in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

UNION METALLIC CARTRIDGE COMPANY.

The bill (S. 420) for the relief of the Union Metallic Cartridge Company was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Patents with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $30,702.60 to the Union Metallic Cartridge Company, of Bridgeport, Conn., for the use by the Government of their patented machines for heading cartridge-cases.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. LAPHAM January 18, 1884:

The Committee on Patents, to whom were referred the bill (S. 420) and accompanying papers for the relief of the Union Metallic Cartridge Company, having considered the same, report thereon as follows:

The relief sought is compensation by the United States for the use by the Government of a patented invention owned by said company for a new and improved method of forming the heads of metallic cartridge-shells.

There is no controversy in the case except upon the question of the amount of compensation to which said company is entitled. By the use of this invention a great saving has been made to the Government. Prior to its use only about five hundred shells could be manufactured or headed in a day, requiring the labor of one man and two assistants, by the use of the best means known in the art. With the invention owned by said company and so used by the Government from thirty thousand to forty thousand shells could be headed in a day, and the process required the labor of only a girl to attend the machine.

Briefly, the invention consists of a mandrel, a die with an aperture through it of the same size as the exterior of the shell to be headed, and a bunter, with proper mechanism for their automatical operation. Shells can be headed by the processes described in this invention with a great saving of expense and with much greater rapidity than by any previously known method, and at the same time a better and more uniform and perfect heading was formed.

The War Department has admitted the use of the invention and the liability of the United States to said company. The only question which has arisen is as to the amount which ought to be paid by the Government for such use.

Application was made by the said company to the Secretary of War in the year 1875, and at his request the Attorney-General of the United States caused an investigation to be made, the result of which was reported by him to the Secretary of War, to the effect that the patent owned by said company was valid and the claim for compensation was just; but as the claimants and the officers of the Government differed as to the amount of such compensation, the question was one which Congress would have to determine. The validity of the patent has also been established by a decision of the court in an action brought by said company against the United States Cartridge Company for an infringement, and the rule of damages for the use of said invention has been fixed by the judgment of the court in said action.

The compensation asked by the bill under consideration is at the same rate thus allowed by the court for an infringement of the company's rights by a private citizen. It appears that the Government has manufactured these shells in very large quantities made beyond its own needs, and that large quantities have been sold at auction from time to time at prices greatly less than the market value, thus putting them upon the market in competition with the owners of the patent. In some cases the shells have been so sold by the Government at less than cost, and said company has been compelled to purchase them from those who obtained them at Government sales in order to save itself from loss. In the judgment of your committee, this fact should be considered in fixing the quantum of compensation, and that an allowance at the rate of damages fixed in the action to which reference has been made is, under the circumstances, but a reasonable rate. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the Government has no right to appropriate to its use an invention for which a patent has been issued, without compensation. To do so would be to take private property for public use without just compensation. (Campbell vs. James, 104 United States Reports, 358.) The Court of Claims has also decided that the Government should pay at the same rate as an individual. (Hubbell vs. United States, 5 Nott & H., Court of Claims Reports, 1.)

Especially, as your committee think, should this be so where the Government, as in this instance, has opened competition with the owners of the patent by sales in the market.

It also appears that during the extension of this patent from the year 1874 the Government had the use of this invention without cost, and the claim is limited to what was manufactured prior to such extension. The quantity thus manufactured is admitted to have been 41,490,174 cartridges or shells at the arsenal at Frankford, Pa. The saving to the Government in the manufacture of this number of shells by the rule settled in the case referred to is $30,702.60.

The committee therefore recommend that the bill be amended by striking out "seventy-five thousand dollars," in lines 5 and 6 of the same, and by inserting in lieu thereof the sum last aforesaid; and as thus amended do recommend the passage of the same.

Mr. COCKRELL. This report says:

The validity of the patent has also been established by a decision of the court in an action brought by said company against the United States Cartridge Company for an infringement, and the rule of damages for the use of said invention has been fixed by the judgment of the court in said action.

We are not referred to that decision, and it does seem to me that it would have been as little as could have been expected that the committee, in acting upon this case and referring to a decision of a court fixing and establishing the rate of compensation, should have named where we could find that decision. I shall have to object until an explanation of that fact is made.

Mr. PLATT. I trust the Senator will not object; the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, and I will say to the the Senator that this case was reported by the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM], who, I think, has in his possession the papers which are referred to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I shall not object if it is not pressed this morning.

Mr. PLATT. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 160) making further appropriations for the relief of destitute persons in the districts overflowed by the Ohio River and its tributaries; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1155) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. SHERMAN, in line 9, after the word "deposited," to insert:

Provided, That if any bonds so deposited bear a higher rate of annual interest than 3 per cent., additional circulating notes shall be issued equal in amount to one-half of the interest accruing on such bonds before their maturity in excess of 3 per cent. per annum, such amount to be ascertained and stated by the Comptroller of the Currency on the 1st day of July of each year hereafter.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I have an amendment pending to this bill which I shall offer at the proper time, but I presume that what I should have to say about that amendment and about the general proposition of the bill might as well be said now as at any time, in view of the wide range the debate has taken. I am reminded by something that was said yesterday of what was said here about three years ago, when, at the demand as I think of the national banks of the United States, or a good many of them at all events, the then President of the United States vetoed a bill substantially for the reason that it fixed the rate of interest on the proposed issue of bonds a little lower than the banks then thought they were willing to carry. Now we are assured by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and by many other persons of equal authority, that a bond which will draw 2 per cent. interest will be entirely acceptable to the banks; and instead of their demanding favors by legislation at our hands, I think, on the whole, their relation has somewhat changed. They are willing to take almost anything they can now get. When I say that I do not mean to be understood as saying that all national banks are so desirous of remaining in the business, with the privileges which the law organizing them confers, that they would be willing to accept any conditions we might impose, but a large number of them are, and I think conspicuously those banks which were the most urgent and the loudest in getting up the clamor which induced the President to veto the bill to which I have referred.

I am willing to say now that I am glad that bill was vetoed. Like a good many other people, both President and banks builded better than they knew. That veto made it tolerably certain that we shall never have any new issue of bonds of the United States, that is to say, no new United States bonds; certainly none unless some emergency not now foreseen shall occur. If that bill had been passed, as radical as it was then deemed, it would have been unwise as a matter of legislation, an unwisdom not then to be observed, but one which now would have been very apparent indeed. It was passed from proper motives and vetoed on insufficient grounds. Those who advocated the bill and those who procured its veto have now changed places. I regard the sentiment of the people of the United States against the continuance of the public debt for any longer period than is made absolutely necessary by the terms of the bonds as fixed and irrevocable. So far as I am concerned I have no desire and no intention certainly to appeal from that decision or endeavor in any way to modify it. I believe it is not only the fixed sentiment of the people but I believe it is based in the highest wisdom, that every material interest of fifty millions of people practically conspires for an early extinction of the national debt.

The money that is locked up in the bonds of the United States is needed to be put back into the industries of the country, setting in motion the wheels of commerce and giving employment to labor. The bonds are most largely held among the capitalists and banks of the Northern seaboard States, the former seat of our shipping interests. When this money is released from its holding as dead capital in the shape of bonds I have great faith that some portion of it at least will, directly or indirectly, find its way into ship-yards, and become the means of a partial revival at least of American shipping now languishing for this among other reasons, that American capital is too dear on account of the superabundant avenues calling for its investment. The country needs more active capital in many directions.

When I speak of the abundance of money I speak of that as a relative question; that is to say, money compared with the opportunities for its productive investment. I want to see the national debt disappear because its disappearance would be practically a solvent of many important questions. We can not consider as we ought to-day the tariff question without at once being confronted with the necessity for providing a large sum of money annually in some way for the payment of the interest and principal of the public debt. Therefore we can not consider that either as an abstract question or as a practical question in itself but its consideration is always embarrassed by this one of which I have spoken.

In the next place, it will enable us to settle this question of national currency unembarrassed by the existence of a national debt. If we had no national debt now, we should not be discussing these bills, we should not be concerned about the amount of bonds, and the effect of the desire of the banks to realize a premium, on the currency of the country. It is the one thing to-day which stands in the way of some definite, rational, and permanent settlement of the question of the currency.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] said yesterday that the debate had exhibited a great unanimity of sentiment in favor of the national banks, the inquiry on all hands being, as he put it, how we can best maintain that system. I think the debate has developed some other things which the Senator from Rhode Island can not be oblivious of, and one of them is that there is the utmost contrariety of opinion as to what scheme if any can be devised to accomplish the object in view. There is absolutely no concurrence on that point. I am myself willing to go as far as any one in commending the national banking system for all that is good in it. It was a wise system in its inception. It performed at a time of great peril to the country the most useful function, not only in supplying a market for a large amount of Government bonds, then slow of sale, but also in supplying currency which took the place of the State bank currency which had then disappeared or was disappearing, and took the place of it at a time when the country perhaps was not ready for more radical measures, and when possibly more radical measures, such as for instance the extension of the greenback currency in any considerable amount, would not have met with favor and perhaps would have invited disaster. It has done more; it has given the country a useful system of banks for discount and deposit purposes.

Mr. President, the relative advantages to this country of the currency which the national banks have issued and of their functions as furnishing a safe deposit for the money of the people and a solid foundation for the business of the country to rest upon are wide apart in comparison. The mere issuing of the currency has not been attended with any great profit to the banks, and it has not been the most useful of the functions which the banks have performed. Banks of discount and deposit are vitally necessary to the business of the country. The more safe they are the better for the entire country. The greatest benefit which could be conferred upon the country in a financial way would be the discovery of a system of banking in which deposits were always secure. This can not of course be done, but we can approximate it nearer and nearer by wise legislation. The national banking system has come the nearest to this of any system yet devised, and its safe-keeping of over a thousand million dollars of deposits and the performance of the functions of discount and exchange have been of far more value to the country than any function it has performed with reference to the currency, and it is worthy to be continued and made more safe and permanent for the performance of these most useful and proper functions of modern banking. But the banks can not long continue to furnish currency owing to the rapid disappearance of the national debt, and the volume of that currency must necessarily be shifting and unstable, and liable at any time to seriously fail to answer the purpose for which it was created.

In fact, the steady reduction of the national debt has already brought us to the consideration, and very gravely too, as to what we shall do to prevent that contraction of the currency which a few years ago was not deemed possible but which is now impending. The various propositions before the Senate, the subject of this discussion, are designed merely, if I may use a homely phrase, to "toggle up" the system.

The measure of my friend from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], which is reported from the Committee on Finance, and which is, therefore, the best the committee can do, is not pretended to be anything more than a measure of temporary relief. Here is my friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], equally eminent and equally a friend of the national banks, who has devised another plan essentially different, and yet he does not anticipate that that will provide a remedy very long; and in fact his own bill provides a sliding scale for the reduction of the currency which we are now seeking to prevent by legislation. In other words, he anticipates and provides for a reduction, while the professed purport of the endeavor we are making is to prevent reduction. So of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and so of all these propositions. Every member proposing a measure is absolutely certain that his is the best, that all others are wrong and not calculated to meet the case, and yet for none of them is it claimed that anything more than a breathing-spell will be the result of its adoption.

Mr. President, when doctors of such eminence disagree what are laymen like myself to do? I found on my table this morning, and I presume there is on the table of every other Senator, an emphatic protest from the president of the Mercantile National Bank of the city of New York against all these plans. He says that all of them are insufficient, that all of them are bad, that no single one of them will offer any remedy whatever for the evil that is now sought to be guarded against.

In the beginning I felt like supporting and thought I probably should support the bill of the Senator from New Jersey. Then, moved by the considerations so eloquently addressed to the body by the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Rhode Island, I felt like fleeing to the remedy they present. I am now confronted with the statement of the president of one of the most conservative and one of the strongest national banks in the city of New York that none of them will be of any avail whatever, and I must confess that on careful consideration I quite agree with him.

This bank president states the case, from the bank standpoint, against the pending propositions, as follows:

> The morning papers quote the discussion in the Senate yesterday (13th) of the McPherson bill, together with the suggestion of an amendment offered by Hon. Senator SHERMAN. From the standpoint of a national-bank officer I beg most respectfully to protest against the adoption of the measure, with or without the amendment proposed.
>
> As I understand it, the aim of the bill is to prevent a contraction of the currency. With that for its object, I beg most respectfully to predict for the bill, if enacted, the most lamentable failure. In evidence of this belief I beg to say that notwithstanding the fact that the 4 per cent. bonds, with their twenty-three and one-half years of life remaining, if purchased at the average price ruling in the past twelve months as against a purchase of the seven-and-one-half-year 4½ percents at the average price of the same period, would have yielded a return to a national bank on circulation of about 2 per cent. per annum more, yet the general aversion among the banks to a high-premium account is so great that the increase in bank pledge of these bonds in this period of a year has been but about $1,000,000 of these better-paying but high-priced 4 percents, as against an increase of more than seven and a half million dollars of the lower-priced 4½ percent. bonds) the greater length of the high-priced bonds adding another feature to weigh in their favor if this aversion were to be overcome. This bill, with all others so far offered in the Senate, have aimed to attract the national banks now pledging 3 per cent. bonds to replace them as called by purchase of these 4 percents or 4½ percents. It is the 3 per cent. holding national bank, therefore, that must be served at this crisis if the public welfare is to be considered in this fear of currency contraction.
> Further to sustain this point the following from the New York Times of to-day (February 14) is in point: "Unless this (tax on circulation) be removed it is quite idle to talk of inducing the banks to replace their 3 per cent. bonds by 4 per cent. bonds with the privilege of circulation up to par."
> But if any of these measures were adopted, and should prove successful, the public will in another way be asked to suffer. At the present rate of Government income and expenditure two and one-half years will serve to exhaust the Government option to call 3 per cent. bonds. Thereafter all unappropriated moneys, unless allowed to accumulate in the Treasury, must be applied to the purchase of outstanding bonds. If meanwhile the banks should be induced to replace their 3 percents as the result of such enactment, it must appear that you will have legislated out of the market nearly $200,000,000 of bonds and correspondingly enhanced the prices of bonds remaining, when the Government must of necessity become a purchaser, and with no option left to bear upon possible clique movement against the Government in the market. How much in the public interest this proceeding would be, when not at all a necessity to prevent the threatened currency contraction, the wise will discover.

The situation then is this: We are proposing measures to prevent the contraction of the currency. No one expresses much confidence in his own proposition, but the utmost lack of it in all the others, and the banks who are sought to be "attracted" so as to induce them to take the 4 per cent. bonds as a basis for currency, and thus add something to its stability, come in and emphatically say none of the plans will accomplish the purpose and that the banks will not buy the long bonds. The adoption of either plan, then, means the destruction of the entire system.

But if what the Senator from Rhode Island said in debate yesterday is correct the system is not answering the purpose of its creation, and so it would hardly seem worth while to maintain it anyhow. He said in effect that the increase or diminution of the currency by the banks had no relation whatever to the business wants of the country. This alone is sufficient to condemn it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I said that owing to the present artificial condition of the bonds of the country upon which the circulation is based at the present time the state of affairs to which he alludes exists.

Mr. PLUMB. I agree to that. That is no amendment to what I stated, because this condition of the bonds is inherent in the system; it cannot be changed. The premium is there, and nothing but the lapse of time, the approach of the maturity of the bonds, will ever interfere with that premium. It will disappear from time to time, but it is still a premium, and consequently this unsafe and uncertain condition of things with reference to the volume of currency to be emitted by the national banks will continue all the time. The knowledge of the fact, too, that the system is wholly dependent upon the national debt and that that debt will soon disappear adds to the instability.

A system of currency which should fluctuate, rise and fall with the demands of the people for money to carry on their business, which would give abundance of money in the fall months when the crops are being moved and which should contract it in some convenient way during the summer months when it is not needed so much, and which should from year to year and from time to time increase with the increasing needs of the country in some automatic way, would be worth accomplishing; but it is something which the national banking system can never accomplish, for the reasons which were stated by the Senator from Rhode Island and which are inherent in the system and which will inhere in that system so long as it is based upon United States bonds. The answer of the Senator from Rhode Island to that is, "Issue new bonds for this particular purpose." But, as I said before, that question has been settled beyond our power to unsettle it. There are to be no new bonds, and it would not be possible to elect any Congress in favor of issuing a new bond for the purpose of maintaining the life of any banking system whatever.

So, Mr. President, we must consider this thing with reference to its present condition, and not upon the impossible one of the issue of new bonds, upon which a new lease of life may be given to the national banking system.

The Senator from Rhode Island's statement that the increase or diminution of the currency is not now conceived or carried out upon any basis or idea of the wants of business is not only true now, but has been equally true for many years—ever since the bonds came to bear any considerable premium. The "flexibility" of the system so-called is therefore completely gone.

In the city of New York are the principal banks of the country. That place is the great reservoir of the money of the country, of its available means. If there is any place where the need of the country money is felt it is New York, not necessarily for use in New York, but borrowers of money from all the country go to New York to borrow, whether they be individual borrowers or banks, and consequently New York can be regarded as a reflex I think of the general condition of the country with reference to the volume of currency needed and the ability and willingness of the banks to furnish it.

There are in the city of New York forty-eight national banks, having a gross capital of $50,350,000, and those fifty banks having this $50,000,000 of capital have only outstanding $15,784,105 of currency. In other words, in the city of New York the ratio of currency to capital is less than one in three. If the banks in New York do not take out more currency, if they do not keep up some ratio of currency to capital, it is because there is no ratio of currency to capital which cuts any figure in the action of the banks in taking it out, so far at least as that ratio affects the general question of currency supply for the country.

The rule in New York city is to take as little currency as is permitted by law; and yet these same banks are now bewailing the shrink in the value of the currency and suggesting means to prevent further contraction, asking inducements which will give them more profit on currency and thus result in their taking it out. In the State of New York outside the city are national banks having a capital of about $40,000,000, and who have more than twice the currency outstanding that the banks of the city have. This currency was not taken out because of a supposed necessity for such an addition to the circulating medium, but purely as an incident to the establishment of banks of discount and deposit under the national system. The national banking charter or franchise was the main motive. The additions to the volume of the currency from this source have been really accidental. The banker who now should deposit $50,000 in Government bonds for the purpose of securing thereon the issue of currency would be obliged to invest $62,000. On this he would get only $45,000 circulating notes, and 5 per cent. of the amount would have to be redeposited in the Treasury in the shape of legal-tender notes as a redemption fund. So, for $62,000 cash invested the banker would get but $42,250 loanable funds. No matter how great the apparent profit, in a majority of cases this process would be attended with a loss, for the banker would have diminished his loanable funds $20,000, and the loss of the use of this, irrespective of the interest, would be a great disadvantage. This disadvantage is largely if not wholly compensated by the value of the national charter, which gives assurance of solvency and in many ways contributes to the esteem in which the bank is held. Most of the newly organized banks, however, as it will be observed, take out the smallest amount of bonds permitted by law, and thus save a large part of the first loss mentioned; and thus it happens that many millions less than the amount of the currency which the banks could take on their capital is issued, and this practice has not changed during the last few months while the currency has been shrinking in amount, showing conclusively that the volume of the currency under the national banking system is purely arbitrary, is liable to fluctuate from considerations of individual profit, and little reliance can be placed on it for the future.

In considering this question of the instability of the currency and the necessity of some plan which shall permanently take the place of the national system so soon to disappear, we are confronted with two alternatives: the one a return to the State-bank system, better known to memory as the red-dog and wild-cat currency. The other is that the Government shall issue the currency direct, under such limitations as to amount and such provisions for redemption as shall not only make the currency safe but stable in amount, and free from the apprehension that it will be from time to time inflated and contracted by the direct action of Congress.

I do not want to see any return to the State banking system; that is to say, so far as it has to do with the issuance of currency. I do not believe that the people want it, nor do I believe they will ever permit it to be resorted to. The country lost too much by it when it collapsed in 1857. Neither is such a return necessary. I believe Congress can prevent any such necessity from arising, and that this can be done by the issue of Treasury notes, receivable for all dues to the Government and redeemable in coin on presentation at the Treasury. The trouble that confronts us with reference to this proposition is the fear that Congress will yield to the temptation to overissue the notes in times of distress, or when there happened a present or prospective deficit in the Treasury. I confess that it would not be very wholesome, perhaps, to be in the daily fear that Congress might increase or diminish the volume of currency in a manner which should have no more relation to the business wants of the country than the action of the banks does now; but I am consoled when I consider that the Finance Committee of this body are unanimous in agreeing that whatever they may do about details, they will absolutely by legislation put from thirty-five to forty million dollars of new currency afloat at one stroke. All the pending propositions provide for an absolute increase of the currency in bulk. Differing as they do in other features, all are alike in this essential particular, and, as I view it, just as vicious as though we should provide by law for the outstanding volume of the legal-tender notes. The least modest of these propositions, that of the Senator from New Jersey, is to add $35,000,000 to the volume of the currency at once, and the other extreme is reached by the Senator from Vermont, who proposes to add $10,000,000 to that, making the inflation $45,000,000.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator has just stated that the banks in New York, some fifty in number, have only circulation to the amount of $15,000,000. I think it will clearly be seen that when circulation is worth even less than the tax they have to pay upon circulation. the banks in New York will not be anxious for more circulation, particularly at a time when they can not loan their deposits. Therefore I think it is equally reasonable to suppose that if there was an active demand for circulation upon the banks of New York, they would increase their circulation up to that demand. As to the inflation of the currency, if the Senator is right in his conclusion, the banks of New York will only call for it as fast as they can make it profitable so far as the business of New York itself is concerned; but does he not think that the country banks, desiring circulation and that can use it with profit at all times, will have the advantage of calling for their circulation in order that they may loan it among their customers?

I do not think under the present circumstances it is proper to take the banking business of New York city as a basis for determining this question. It is known that for a long time money has only commanded 1 per cent. in New York city even upon call, and now the tax upon circulation is 1 per cent. Therefore there is no reason, with the immense deposits they have to loan and can not loan to advantage, why they should call for increased circulation; nor do I think they will do so under the bill reported by the Finance Committee, but it gives them this privilege: they can call for it when the demands of the country ask for it, and the country banks may demand it now.

Mr. PLUMB. Well, Mr. President, if the theory which the Senator from New Jersey seems to have in mind now about this matter is correct, why legislate at all? If the banks are not going to take this currency, why give them the opportunity of doing it? I have, however, more confidence in them than the Senator, and I say they will take every dollar of it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The fact is that while a bank has an authorized capital of a certain number of dollars, a certain number of hundreds of thousands of dollars, it only takes out a certain proportion of circulation. The evidence is altogether against the argument of the Senator from Kansas. While I think that the bill reported by the Finance Committee is perhaps not a full remedy, it is a remedy.

Mr. PLUMB. I should be glad to hear the Senator, but I do not care to have him now put a speech right into mine. I will answer all his questions, but I will listen to his arguments later.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DAWES in the chair). The Senator from Kansas is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PLUMB. The banks of New York have, as I said, a little over $15,000,000 of currency, and by this bill of the Senator from New Jersey they will be permitted to take out on the same bonds they already have on deposit a million and a half more. I have that confidence in those banks to believe that if any one were to offer them a million and a half of dollars without asking anything in return they would take it, but the Senator from New Jersey thinks otherwise. Every bank will take it, and take it as quick as it can get it. If it was not expected they would this bill would not have been reported.

So, as I said, I find the Finance Committee, Democrats and Republicans alike, embracing men who more than any other men perhaps in the country have the confidence of the people as to their judgment upon financial questions, proposing by one single act of legislation, and practically without any inquiry or upon any suggestion that the country needs the currency, to add from $35,000,000 to $45,000,000 of notes to the volume outstanding; and so I am constrained to believe that there is not as much danger after all in leaving this question to succeeding Congresses who may want to legislate concerning it as I first thought there was. Why, Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] have never appeared to as much advantage in my judgment as they have when they have descanted upon the unwisdom and the folly of leaving to Congress any such question as the control of the volume of the currency by direct legislation, and yet I am prepared now to see them go back upon all they have said, because they are asking us now to do this very thing.

I do not object to this increase of the volume of currency, although I do not believe it is needed. The evil which should be guarded against is the contraction of the currency by reason of its surrender by the national banks, a process now under way and threatening largely to increase and to bring great trouble upon the country. The proposition is to meet the difficulty not by providing against contraction but by arbitrary inflation, leaving in full force and vigor all the elements of contraction by which we are seriously threatened.

Mr. BAYARD. I think the Senator is in error; he misapprehends and unintentionally misstates the principle of the proposed extension of the per cent. of currency notes that may be issued to the banks upon a deposit of Government bonds. It is in no way akin to the idea of the issue of currency notes by the Government itself upon demand. It is as far from it as the present national banking system or any other system of bank notes is from what is commonly known as the greenback theory of the issue of Treasury notes. The same principle that interposes the system of national banks and allows the commercial necessities of the country to control the volume of the currency for the commercial operations of the country is just as much preserved by this amendment of the committee as it was by the former law that allowed the issue of 90 per cent. instead of 100. The Senator should not misunderstand the principle which lies underneath this proposition which I presented as the organ of the committee and which I favor in the Senate. It has in it nothing whatever like the issue of money direct from the Treasury under the direction of the political power.

Mr. PLUMB. Well, Mr. President, there may be a difference in the process, but the result is precisely the same. It is absolutely known that the banks will take out the 10 per cent. addition to their circluation if this bill passes; the amount can be determined to a fraction. It is just as effective an addition by Congressional legislation to the volume of the currency as though Congress had said to the Secretary of the Treasury "Issue $35,000,000 to-morrow and add that much to the volume of Treasury notes outstanding."

Mr. BAYARD. Will it further interrupt the Senator if I say a word?

Mr. PLUMB. Oh, no; I yield.

Mr. BAYARD. As a matter of fact the report of the Comptroller of the Currency will show that the banks to-day are entitled to take four million more of currency under the ratio of 90 per cent. than they have taken. Under the dictation of self-interest there has not been in their opinion a profitable use for the full amount of the ratio of 90 per cent. which the present law allows. The banks to-day in the aggregate could increase the circulation under the 90 per cent. law four million more than now exists.

The Senator will pardon me forinterrupting him. I only wished to correct his statement in the misapprehensions he seemed to be making. The volume of the currency, whether it be in the ratio of 90 per cent. upon the 100 cents deposited in bonds or 100 per cent. upon the par value of the bonds is a commercial question that the banks will settle themselves. If there shall be a demand for currency in this country the deposit of bonds by the banks under the national system can always produce it. If it is wanted in any part of this country, under the absolutely free principle of free banking which exists, any five men having a capital of $50,000 and upward can form their bank, deposit their bonds, and get just such amount of currency to-day up to the ratio of 90 per cent., and should this bill presented by the committee pass, up to the ratio of 100 per cent. upon the amount of bonds that they choose to deposit, and draw such currency as commercial exigencies shall tell them it is profitable to use.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, all that argument applies to the establishment of new banks and to the deposit of new bonds as a basis for the issue of new currency, but it is wholly and entirely apart from the first and immediate and certain effect of this bill, which will be to add to the circulation now outstanding $35,000,000. That is the bill of the Senator from New Jersey, which will add 10 per cent. to the entire amount outstanding. That is the first thing it will do.

Mr. BAYARD. It will create the capability of the issue.

Mr. PLUMB. Now we will come to the question of banks that do not want the circulation. There are some banks in New York that do not want to be bothered with circulation and do not think there is any profit in it on the present basis. I have before me a list of the banks in New York. Here is one bank of $3,000,000 capital that takes out no circulation whatever.

Mr. BAYARD. That is the Chemical Bank.

Mr. PLUMB. That is the Chemical Bank. It did not take any currency and probably will not under this bill. Having none, its taking none does not disturb the ratio of increase. But any bank which can now afford to carry 90 per cent. of currency on its deposit of bonds can better afford to carry 100 per cent. on the same deposit of bonds. You are simply giving the banks the use of thirty-five million more currency than they have now without requiring them to add one dollar to the capital or bonds now held. It will not do to say that they will not take it out on account of philosophic considerations as to the volume of currency. The acquisitive faculty is too strong for that. They will take every dollar of it; it will go into circulation, followed by all the consequences of great and arbitrary inflation, and I much fear to be shortly followed by a contraction all the more severe on account of the inflation by which it was preceded.

Mr. President, all these plans will in my judgment be ineffective. The one thing that is important in this situation is the premium on the bonds. It can not be got rid of. On the contrary, the passage of any of these measures will add to it. If it were not for the banking system the bonds would not be selling at the high figures they are. If they could not be made the basis of circulating notes and an adjunct of the banking system, they would decline. The more uses you give them, the more people want them, the higher they will be; and by this bill it is proposed to increase their use, to make additional inducements for men not only to use what they have got but to take more, and the holders of the bonds will require banks that come to buy them, if they are to buy them at all, to divide the profit with them, and the 4 per cent. bonds may then be calculated to go up to at least 128, and I believe if this bill passes, and especially if the amendment of the Senator from Vermont should be adopted, they will go to 130, and the higher the premium rises the more insecure is the basis of your currency, for the higher the premium the greater the reluctance of the banks to lose it, and the more certain they will be to sell to save it; and especially is this true of the banks holding 4 percents which they bought at par or near that point. The temptation to sell the bonds and realize a premium which would add one-third to capital in the way of profit will be very great. And as the bonds are sold the currency is contracted. Thus the volume of the currency, of such vital importance to the welfare of the country, is dependent upon the merest chance.

I know the Senator from New Jersey differs with me on this point, and what is more he differs with the Senator from Vermont and the Senators from Ohio and Rhode Island. These Senators think his bill if not wholly bad still but a temporary makeshift, and one of doubtful utility at the best. And we are proposing in so vital a matter to legislate upon mere guesswork. Would it not be better to make certain that the currency should not be contracted—to do at least that much in order that the country may be safe while we are perfecting something permanent for the future? With what confidence will men do business with the volume of the currency subject to these contingencies, not knowing to-day whether the currency is going to be $35,000,000 more or $50,000,000 less and with an apprehension, guided by what has occurred heretofore, telling them all the time the chances are that the currency will shrink and diminish rather than enlarge?

I again call attention to the circular from the president of the Mercantile National Bank of New York from which I have heretofore read, which clearly indicates the source of the trouble and that it will be aggravated by the passage of the bill under consideration:

> As I understand it, the aim of the [McPherson] bill is to prevent a contraction of the currency. With that for its object I beg most respectfully to predict for the bill, if enacted, the most lamentable failure. In evidence of this belief I beg to say that notwithstanding the fact that the 4 per cent. bonds, with their twenty-three and a half years of life remaining, if purchased at the average price ruling in the past twelve months as against a purchase of the seven-and-a-half year 4½ percents at the average price of the same period, would have yielded a return to a national bank on circulation of about 2 per cent. per annum more, yet the general aversion among the banks to a high premium account is so great that the increase in bank pledge of these bonds in this period of a year has been but about $1,000,000 of these better-paying but high-priced 4 percents, as against an increase of more than seven and a half million dollars of the lower-priced 4½ per cent. bonds.

If there is a repugnance on the part of the banks to carrying bonds that have a premium of 23½, how much will that repugnance be increased if the premium goes to 30 per cent., or to any appreciable point beyond where it now is? And in connection with that I wish to speak of the statement that the Senator from Rhode Island made yesterday, and which I have also had from the Treasury Department, to the effect that the banks who now hold 4 per cent. bonds are the banks which bought them when they were at par or only a little above par, and since that time practically no banks have taken 4 percents on account of the premium. There are about $100,000,000 of the 4 percents held as basis for circulation by the banks who originally took them, and who, if they sell now, can get this 23½ per cent. premium as profit derived from the holding. Now, run those bonds up to 25, to 27, to 30, and what is going to be the effect? If the banks representing the other $235,000,000 of currency have not heretofore been willing to buy bonds at 23 premium, are we certain they are going to buy them at 30? Yes, says the Senator from New Jersey, because we give them the right to take out more currency; but as an offset to that is the great probability, I think almost a certainty, that the banks that have held these bonds so long will hasten to sell them and to realize the high premium and put it into their profit account.

So while we may have more currency taken out by the banks that have $200,000,000 of 3 percents soon to mature and certain to be paid, we may lose and probably shall lose a large amount of the currency based upon the 4 percents now held by the other banks. In other words, we are providing a measure which will appeal strongly to the acquisitiveness of all these banks to realize the premium on the bonds before they commence to decline. I believe that none of these measures will be effective to perform anything of what we hope or expect of them for a longer period than twelve months perhaps, and even not so soon as that.

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not want to take up the Senator's time, but I wish he would yield to me for one moment now.

Mr. PLUMB. I will do so.

Mr. McPHERSON. Is it not evident as to the banks banking on a 4 or a 4½ per cent. bonds that the fact that they are now holding such bonds, notwithstanding the high premium, shows that they can afford to bank upon them?

Mr. PLUMB. There are various considerations that have induced them to hold them, the most potent one of which I think is that they have been under the conviction that the premium was to go higher, and they have, therefore, held to get a larger profit. I would be sorry to see them put under temptation furnished by a higher premium and a larger profit, inasmuch as that temptation might result to the great damage of the country.

Practically no bonds are bought and sold in New York to-day; that is to say, the purchases are very small. Men bet on them as they do on stocks, bet that they will go up or go down; but I have it from very good authority that the purchase of $10,000,000 4 per cent. bonds or any other bonds in New York for actual cash delivery would put the price up at least 3 per cent.; and yet if this bill is to have any effect such as is anticipated, it is to make a scramble among the banks that now have the 3 percents to buy the 4 percents, and the result of that scramble would be to run the premium up greatly higher than it is now. Then, as I said, while some banks will be getting 4 percents other banks will be selling them in order to realize the profit, and either go out of the business totally, or at all events to the extent that they can without losing their charters.

I regard the situation, then, as it now stands, with the shrinkage of the currency during the past two months of ten or twelve million dollars, with the certainty that as these 3 per cent. bonds are redeemed that shrinkage will continue and that it is going to be enormously accelerated—as I said, I regard the situation from that standpoint as critical. I do not want to see Congress adjourn without doing something to make certain that that condition of things will not continue. But on the other hand I do not see that either one of these measures offers any certainty of a postponement even of that dangerous condition of things. I think we ought to provide for something to take the place of such national-bank circulation as may be surrendered from time to time. Having done that, and thus averted the threatened danger, we can proceed leisurely to make provision for the future.

We are not without precedent to guide our action. The people came to view with great apprehension the contraction of the greenback circulation being carried out by the Treasury Department, and notwithstanding the strong effort that was made against it Congress by an overwhelming vote put a stop to the contraction, and said that hereafter the greenback circulation should remain permanent and fixed in amount, and there it has stood ever since. The people mean to maintain that currency in its present volume at least, and do not mean that by their act its value shall in any way be impaired. They mean that it shall be a legal tender between individuals, that it shall have the highest possible money function, and they will maintain it against Congress, and against courts, if necessary.

Now, Congress did that. It was a wise, prudent, far-seeing, judicious action; it has been indorsed everywhere, and there is no voice heard now anywhere, at least from any potential quarter, seeking to reverse that action. What I would propose is that we should do the same thing with the volume of the national-bank circulation; but we can not do that in the same way we could with the greenback circulation, because the Government does not control it as we do the greenback circulation. The banks may retire from the business; they may close up with their bonds and their circulation, and we have no control over their action; we can not prevent them from doing that. What we can do is this: We can provide that for every dollar of their circulation that shall be surrendered an equal amount of Treasury notes shall be issued, and thus maintain the present volume of the currency. That is just as wise, just as conservative, just as wholesome, just as much within the purview of proper legislation as it was for Congress to enact that the greenback circulation should not be diminished in amount.

It would not be necessary that the new notes should be legal-tender. That question might be waived. If the Government takes them for all dues coming to it, including duties upon imports; if they should be made receivable between national banks (which it is perfectly competent for Congress to do) and be receivable by the national banks from individuals dealing with them, there would not be any trouble about their being kept at par and answering just as useful a purpose as the legal-tender notes answer and just as useful as the notes of the national banks.

I know that there has been a widespread feeling that Congress ought not to get into this business further, but what doubts I had on that subject have been modified by the action of the Finance Committee of the Senate. They are fixing now, or assuming to fix, or asking Congress to fix, the volume of currency, to increase it, to inflate it, if you please, and I think Congress might just as well go the other step, and say that instead of keeping up the instrumentalities for the exercise of that which is a part of its sovereignty it will issue the notes direct, at least to the extent of filling the voids that may be created by the surrender of national-bank circulation.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. How would the Senator put into circulation the new notes which he proposes to have issued in place of those returned?

Mr. PLUMB. The smallest of my concern in this world has been how to spend the money that I was lucky enough to get; and from what I have observed here I have not observed that the Government has any more trouble in spending its money than I have in spending mine. If these Treasury notes are put into the vaults of the Treasury as other current funds they would be paid out in the discharge of the obligations of the Government created by law.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Then I understand that is the only way which occurs to the Senator by which the circulation of the Government proposed to be substituted for the notes returned by the banks can get into circulation?

Mr. PLUMB. I have not deemed it necessary to go into that subject more exhaustively. It will get out fast enough in the ways I have mentioned. And why should there be any more difficulty in regard to these notes than in regard to other funds?

Mr. VOORHEES. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas a question suggested by the question of the Senator from Florida. It is whether he or anybody else in the history of the world ever knew of there being any difficulty in getting par money into circulation and into the uses of life?

Mr. PLUMB. I never heard of any.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not suppose the Senator from Florida ever did either.

Mr. PLUMB. By the adoption of such a measure as the one I propose the contraction of the currency will be arrested; we will promote the business of the country resting upon that volume of currency in its present condition. What we shall do for the future the future itself can disclose. There are a great many ways whereby this currency could be increased from time to time to meet such increasing want as might be developed without entering upon any dangerous legislative ground. But it is enough now to do just what we did with the greenback currency, stop the contraction, say that whatever volume of currency is now outstanding shall be maintained, and when we have done that, having got our feet upon solid ground, we can look about us and see what next we shall do, just as we have done heretofore, going by successive steps forward as we learn and as we feel that we are moving in a safe way. Who would have said thirty years ago that the Government of the United States would have issued legal-tender notes, and that they would have gone into the volume of the currency and remained there permanently fixed? And who does not know now that the volume of that currency is going to remain as now? It will remain there because it is the embodiment of the honest judgment, the highest wisdom, of the American people as applied to financial matters. What I propose in no way trenches upon the national banking system nor upon its currency. If the national banks continue to provide the currency, all right. But all the legislation proposed is based upon the idea that the present system is insufficient as now existing to maintain the requisite volume of currency.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator before he commences on any new branch of the subject, as he has been so very liberal in yielding to other questions, allow me to ask him one more?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, sir.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator states in his argument that the bill reported by the committee is entirely insufficient. Would it not be wiser if that is found to be insufficient to simply remove the tax on circulation, which would afford a still greater remedy? The Government does not need the revenue, and that seems to be a very easy way out of the difficulty.

Mr. PLUMB. I can think of a great many things that would perhaps induce people to enter into banking and issue currency; anything that is made profitable enough people will engage in; but that is not my idea of how the currency should be provided. I do not want to guess whether a certain measure is going to be profitable enough to induce somebody to operate under it.

Mr. McPHERSON. This is not a guess; it is an absolute calculation to a certainty.

Mr. PLUMB. I know what the calculation is; that is to say, I know it would give them more profit than now; but the currency is bound to be, under any proper system, the smallest part of the profits of any bank. No bank engages in banking for the purpose of getting the currency. That is always a subsidiary thing. The main thing is the lending of money. Can we ever tell that that main purpose will not absorb the minor one, and that a bank will not at any time by reason of the greater profit of doing its business some other way go out of the business? It is only a guess at the best. Whatever system of that kind may be established is liable to be overturned anyhow, for the reason that the payment of the bonds is not thereby arrested, and so the currency based on them is obliged to shift, and if it takes one profit to-day to induce the banks to go on, to-morrow it may take another, and we may yield, consciously or unconsciously, to immeasurable demands finally in order to maintain what we regard as the proper volume of currency.

This is only anticipating what we have got to meet sooner or later. These bonds are being paid off. There is no certainty that under any possible inducements the banks will buy the fours to replace the threes. Can they buy them? The report of the Comptroller shows that one-third of the bonds and more are held by the savings-banks. There are a good many uses to which Government bonds can be put which no other security will meet and which will induce some people to buy them at almost any price. The amount of bonds is very limited when we consider the uses to which they can be put. To answer the purpose for currency the banks must buy to keep and not to sell. Their bonds are deposited in Washington beyond their immediate reach—they are a permanent investment. There are capitalists who can better afford to buy the bonds than the banks can—the class of men who at some seasons have idle funds they want to so use as while realizing interest are always convertible at a moment's notice. A 2 per cent. bond would be taken by such people at par perhaps. But the banks might not find their profit in carrying them. The buying and selling of bonds by private persons does not affect the currency; but when the banks buy and sell the effect is direct upon the currency. Consequently we want some plan which will certainly induce the banks to take and keep the requisite amount of bonds. I doubt if this can be done with our limited debt, and especially while it bears an interest which keeps it at a high premium. Any more competition between the banks and private holders would greatly increase that premium and add to the difficulty we are now experiencing.

Why not now, when the subject is up, while we are confronted with it in a serious way, make such provision as that hereafter there shall be at least no diminution of the circulating medium of the country until such time as we can devise something which is to permanently take the place of that which is inevitably to disappear? We ought to do that as I think now. We would have then the production of the precious metals, so far as they might be coined, to furnish additional volume to the currency from time to time, and I think that might perhaps answer for a great many years. Possibly we would not need to add anything to the volume of the currency beyond what it is now, except such addition as would naturally come from the product of our mines.

While I am on that point I will say that I was sorry to observe the Senator from Ohio could not discuss the national banking question without making the usual fling at silver. The silver that we have, the silver dollars, the silver certificates, have answered a good purpose. The remonetization of silver, in my judgment, was the beginning of prosperity. Whatever else may become of it, I shall, at least, be grateful to it for what it has done.

Who knows that the product of silver is going to keep up? Nobody can tell. The Leadville mining camp, an area of country not four miles square, produces one-third, yes, it produces nearly one-half of all the silver that is produced in the United States. Nature does not often repeat itself in that way. There has been talk about mining camps that would rival Leadville, but none have yet been discovered, and none may be discovered for a generation. If the output of that mining camp should fall off or disappear entirely, as it may in the next four or five years, silver would appreciate at once to gold, unless something not now to be foreseen should occur to prevent it.

I notice that the antagonism of some persons to silver is totally disconnected from any question as to its value. It was just as fixed and just as unalterable and just as vicious, I may say, when silver was above gold in price as now when it is below. There may be all sorts of new reasons for stopping the coinage of silver, but not any reason that I regard as of value for ceasing to use it as the basis for the silver certificate, which goes into circulation and which is welcomed everywhere so far as I know.

Something has been learned, too, as the result of the legislation of last winter, and that is that gold will not circulate where a paper substitute is provided. It took years to get legislation authorizing the issue of gold certificates, and during all that time it was being shouted all over the world that silver would not circulate, and every effort was made to put it down, but when the act was passed authorizing the issue of gold certificates gold ceased to circulate. Who is it who sees any more gold than he sees of silver? It is not found in circulation. It simply means that the people do not want any metallic money for actual use. What they want of that is as a basis for paper, which is better accommodated to their needs.

I may say further, as being germane to what has been said on this subject, that I firmly believe that the United States Government has never since silver was remonetized made an honest, square, and manly effort to maintain its value. It has never made an effort which was regarded as sincere either at home or abroad. The Latin nations do not believe it and England does not believe it. In other words, the power of this country never has been put behind this, one of the most valuable of all its products. There have been pretended attempts, there have been genteel conferences, there have been sheets of paper written over, great publications made, and all that sort of thing, but it has only been the shelter and the veneer behind which has been the usual inevitable sneer at silver as money; and Europe does not believe to-day that America is in earnest about it or honest in seeking to maintain the silver dollar.

As I before said, the remonetization of silver has done immense good. Without it I believe resumption would not have been possible, at least at the time when it was accomplished. It has filled the arteries of our commerce with a safe and acceptable currency and made a broad and stable base for business, besides preventing the sacrifice of the debtor class to their creditors.

I will ask the Secretary to read the amendment which I have proposed and which embodies the idea which I have sought to elucidate. I do not claim that it is perfect. I admit that it will accomplish only one thing, that of keeping the volume of currency exactly where it is. If any man wants to know what I would do in the future, I would simply say, as I said before, that the future must take care of itself. At least as much can be said of this as can be said of the national banking system; in fact more, because that is bound to disappear, and with the disappearance of it goes the currency. This plan will at least maintain the present volume of the currency until such time as Congress in its wisdom shall devise some way of adapting that volume from time to time to the needs of the country. I am willing to wait for that, but in the mean time I want to feel that the immediate future is secure. I do not want the people of this country to go into this year's business or next year's business confronted with the possibility, nay, the certainty almost, that the volume of the currency is to shrink, and consequently bring disaster to all business.

There has already been a very considerable shrinkage. We are now legislating to prevent it, and we are clinging close to the one idea. We are assuming that there is only one way to do it; yet while we are doing that, we are confessing that the plan devised is uncertain in its effect. It must necessarily be so, for it depends upon the shifting and uncertain basis which is the cause of the present alarm.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DAWES in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas wish to have his amendment read?

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill:

That whenever the circulation of any national bank, or any portion thereof, shall be surrendered, the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon issue an equivalent amount of Treasury notes of the denominations now provided by law for national-bank notes. Said Treasury notes shall be deposited in the Treasury and paid out as other moneys kept for the discharge of the obligations of the Government. They shall be receivable for salaries and for all dues to the Government, including duties on imports; shall be a legal tender between national banks and for all debts due to any national bank; shall be redeemable in coin as the legal-tender notes of the United States now are; and when received into the Treasury they shall be reissued, and when mutilated or worn they shall be replaced in the same manner as now provided by law for said legal-tender notes. The coin held in the Treasury at the date of the passage of this act for the redemption of the legal-tender notes of the Government shall also be applicable to the redemption of the Treasury notes herein provided for; and such coin reserve may from time to time be increased by adding thereto other sums from payments made into the Treasury, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That the total amount of said coin reserve shall never be less than 25 per cent. nor more than 30 per cent. of the total amount of legal-tender and Treasury notes outstanding.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I certainly did not intend to say anything in regard to this financial proposition, but it does seem to me, with even my limited knowledge of this very——

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator yield to me for a request about another bill, as I have to leave the Chamber in a few moments?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I should like unanimous consent to make the bill (S. 698) to authorize the construction of additional steel vessels for the Navy a special order for Wednesday next at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent to make the bill indicated by him a special order for Wednesday next at 2 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRISON. I shall object to special orders. We have some work on the Calendar that I am anxious to reach.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the Senator from Florida will proceed.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I wish to say that the proposition of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] really involves a revolution of our entire financial system.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Florida yield to me again for a moment?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] will not insist on his objection. It is a very important bill; I do not think it will take a very long time; and it is I think very essential that the action of the Senate should be taken upon it so that it may be sent over to the House. I hope in consideration of the importance of the bill the Senator from Indiana will not object.

Mr. HARRISON. That appeal we have listened to repeatedly, and it amounts to just this: that if we from day to day make bills special orders, other bills which are on the Calendar and which are nearly reached, in which some of us are interested, will be indefinitely postponed. Therefore I will not withdraw the objection now; it may be that I shall in a day or two.

Mr. HALE. I will take occasion to make the motion at the proper time. I shall not further interfere with the Senator from Florida at present.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I was about to say that I think the proposition of the Senator from Kansas goes much further than he himself imagines, and if carried out at this time it will involve a complete revolution in our present system of furnishing currency to the American people. If we are prepared for that on this proposition, let us understand the gravity of the question.

As I understand it now, there are two sources from which paper currency emanates, the one the banks and the other the Government. The issue of the Government money proper is limited by law, beyond which it can not go. If it is intended to destroy that limit and to change the power of the Government to furnish paper money to the American people without regard to limit, let us understand it, for that is the proposition of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. No, I do not say anything of the kind, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him. All I say is that the limit now existing of paper currency shall be kept up by the device of issuing in lieu of national-bank notes an amount equal to the amount of those notes retired. If one limit has been fixed by law, I think another one can equally be fixed.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The amount of greenback currency as now existing is fixed by law, and the Senator proposes, in case of the return to the Treasury on the part of the banks of the currency for which they can not find use in business circles, that you shall give power to the Government to substitute its notes in lieu of those returned to the Treasury. That is the proposition.

I have been instructed, as far as I have had any instruction on this subject, that there is but one safe way in which paper money can find circulation among business people. The idea that the currency is to be founded upon the mere expenditure of Government is a false one. I have been taught to believe that there is but one sound view on the subject, and that is, that the paper circulation of every country is regulated by the wants of trade and commerce, and that whenever you interpose the arbitrary hand of Government to furnish a medium of circulation beyond the measure of business demands you find yourself trenching upon those sacred rights of property which will bring confusion and ruin to the very people whom you seek to benefit.

I asked the Senator from Kansas a while ago how he proposed to put these notes into circulation. I did not question the credit of the Government for one moment. I did not suppose that any man in this country would refuse to take a note of the United States made payable for taxes and other public dues. But if a national bank in New York sends to the Treasury $100,000 to-day, which it has a right to do if it can find no use for that currency, the proposition of the Senator is that the Government of the United States shall at once substitute its notes in lieu of those returned by the bank. I asked the Senator how it was proposed to get these notes into circulation. "Oh," he says, "we can spend money just as fast as we desire it." I know that, and as a public man I say to him very candidly that that spirit is too dominant in this country to-day, and that I never understood it to be the wisdom of statesmanship to enlarge the field of public expenditure and to advocate the lavishing of money for objects not necessary for the public good. If you enter upon this policy you will find yourself in a field where you can not control your own action, and which may prove destructive to the best business interests of the land.

Mr. PLUMB. I supposed the Senator was purely jocular when he asked me about how we would get rid of that money.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. No; I was not.

Mr. PLUMB. If he understood my reply to indicate that I meant to indulge in lavish expenditure in order to get rid of it he is entirely mistaken.

I propose, as my amendment shows, that this money shall be redeemable in gold and silver coin, and I am instructed somewhat by reading the statute of July 14, 1870, on a similar subject. That act was intended chiefly for the purpose of providing for funding the debt, but it also provided for issuing gold certificates; not certificates based upon a dollar of gold for every dollar of certificates issued; but it was provided that a dollar of certificates might be issued for every twenty-five cents of gold deposited. I do not know where the Senator from Florida was then, but certainly his voice was not loud in regard to the revolutionary character of that proceeding. That was regarded in those days as pretty wise legislation.

The greenback note is nothing but a gold certificate or silver certificate. It is a certificate payable in either gold or silver at the option of the holder, and behind it sometimes there is 25 per cent. of gold and silver, sometimes 33⅓ per cent., and sometimes 40 per cent. That is all there is of that.

This is not a new question. It is an old question. I admit that whenever you open up a new field for legislation it is wise to consider it carefully and thoroughly and fully before going into it, and that there is danger whichever way we turn; but this is a question of degree and not of kind. If $356,000,000 of greenback notes redeemable in coin at the option of the holder are not dangerous, where would be the danger in $700,000,000, similarly made redeemable, with the amount kept within limit, by the fact that they are to be redeemable on presentation in coin? Congress is not going to lose its wits, I take it, and the promises of the Government are not going to be violated. This country is not noted for that at all events. By section 5 of the act of July 14, 1870, it is provided—

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, at any time within two years from the passage of this act, to receive gold coin of the United States on deposit for not less than thirty days, in sums not exceeding $100.

Then it provides for the issuance of the certificates, &c.; it provides that the interest on the deposit shall cease at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury, and then goes on to say:

And not less than 25 per cent. of the coin deposited for or represented by said certificates of deposits shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of said certificates.

There was a provision for the issuance of a coin certificate, a dollar of which should be based only on 25 cents of coin at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury. This enormous power was given to the Secretary of the Treasury. He certainly was under no more obligation to exercise that wisely than Congress would be.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. When was that?

Mr. PLUMB. That was in 1870. I can go back further. There is a section of the Revised Statutes enacted during the war which provided for issuing 120 for 100, that is 20 per cent. surplus over and above the amount of gold deposited.

The question of a relation other than that of dollar for dollar between paper and coin has been recognized in every conceivable shape by this Government, and it is only a question whether the amount you issue can be redeemed in coin which in any way concerns us in determining that relation.

There are a great many ways whereby this can be fortified. It has been suggested as a conservative method of doing it that there shall be placed back of all this money bonds of the United States to be kept in the Treasury and to be sold whenever necessary by the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain funds to redeem the outstanding notes. That could easily be done, and it does not lie in the mouth of any one to say that that would not be just as safe as the plan we have got now. We have the bonds there now belonging to individuals; they are there for this very purpose and no other purpose. We can do that.

The Senator from Florida is simply quibbling about a matter of detail. There is nothing inherent in the proposed system which has not been heretofore adopted by the Government. It was the doctrine of Calhoun that the Government could properly issue exchequer bills and float them as currency, bearing a certain ratio to the Government expenditure.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Do I understand the Senator to affirm in his place in the Senate that it has been the practice in this Government at all times to issue paper money as the currency of the American people?

Mr. PLUMB. I was speaking about the doctrine announced by Calhoun as the proper governmental policy.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Was that policy carried out?

Mr. PLUMB. I do not know that it was. I spoke of it as showing that the policy proposed is not new. The Senator has been in the Senate longer than I have, and, in common with many other persons from the section of the country which he represents and adorns, has followed the teachings of Calhoun. This plan is one that has been partially used by this Government for many years, and there is nothing unsafe about it, and nothing that invites or could in any way bring about the dangers which the Senator from Florida seeks to appall us with.

When the Senator talks about the volume of the currency adjusting itself to the business of the country he will find that that result is better obtained in the way I propose, because if a man does not want his Treasury notes he can present them to the Government and get gold or silver and take it away with him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. BAYARD. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] I think is pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARRIS. I believe all the amendments are in the nature of substitutes, and the amendment of the Senator from Ohio was the first offered and is therefore first in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is first in order.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the amendment read.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I wish to say one word only in reply to my friend from Kansas. I would say to him that the history of modern times will not show us a country in the world that has been noted for having first-class credit that ever made a practice, a permanent practice, of issuing purely government paper money.

Mr. PLUMB. Except the United States.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Except the United States, but——

Mr. PLUMB. That is a very important exception.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. She has never made it a permanent system. Some of the continental countries have. Russia, Austria, all the weaker powers of the continent have done it, and their paper has been hawked about for one-third of its value, issued by the million beyond the wants of the people. Take that country to-day whose credit has been the source of her strength in all the great contests that she has been called upon to meet; in war, in peace, in diplomacy, in everything, the secret of her power and of her power to-day is her credit; and she has never issued Government paper money to be used as a legal tender.

Mr. HARRIS. Let us have the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The SECRETARY. In line 9 of the bill, after the word "deposited," it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That if any bonds so deposited bear a higher rate of annual interest than 3 per cent., additional circulating notes shall be issued equal in amount to one-half of the interest accruing on such bonds before their maturity in excess of 3 per cent. per annum, such amount to be ascertained and stated by the Comptroller of the Currency on 1st day of July of each year hereafter: And provided further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon this question the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] calls for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK (when Mr. VANCE's name was called). The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] requested me to say that he was paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. SHERMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I was not aware of the fact, but, if so, I ask leave to withdraw my vote. No doubt the Senator from Kentucky is correct, but I had forgotten for the moment that I was paired. I withdraw my vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. DOLPH. I desire to state that I am paired with my colleague [Mr. SLATER] upon this amendment. I do not see him in the Senate, and I presume he will not be here to vote. If he were present, he would vote against the amendment and I should vote for it.

The result was announced—yeas 7, nays 42; as follows:

YEAS—7.

Allison,	Miller of N. Y.,	Platt,	Van Wyck.
Hale,	Morrill,	Sawyer,

NAYS—42.

Aldrich,	Cullom,	Hill,	Morgan,

Dolph,	Jones of Nevada,	Ridleberger,	Williams.
Edmunds,	Lapham,	Sabin,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. MORRILL. I thought the next amendment was the one proposed by me as a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment now offered is the one proposed on the 29th of January. It is an amendment to the text of the bill, and it would be in order before the amendment of the Senator from Vermont at any time.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas intend this as an additional section?

Mr. BAYARD. It was originally drafted I think as a substitute.

Mr. PLUMB. I intend it as an additional section to the bill of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will call attention to the fact of the amendments I offered yesterday to the text of the bill, improving the phraseology of the bill so that no one could mistake its meaning. I think the committee are all agreed upon those amendments. They were in possession of the Secretary yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] as an additional section. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 2. That whenever the circulation of any national bank, or any portion thereof, shall be surrendered, the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon issue an equivalent amount of Treasury notes of the denominations now provided by law for national-bank notes. Said Treasury notes shall be deposited in the Treasury and paid out as other moneys kept for the discharge of the obligations of the Government. They shall be receivable for salaries and for all dues to the Government, including duties on imports; shall be a legal tender between national banks and for all debts due to any national bank; shall be redeemable in coin, as the legal-tender notes of the United States now are; and when received into the Treasury they shall be reissued, and when mutilated or worn they shall be replaced in the same manner as now provided by law for said legal-tender notes. The coin held in the Treasury at the date of the passage of this act for the redemption of the legal-tender notes of the Government shall also be applicable to the redemption of the Treasury notes herein provided for; and such coin reserve may from time to time be increased by adding thereto other sums from payments made into the Treasury, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That the total amount of said coin reserve shall never be less than 25 per cent. nor more than 30 per cent. of the total amount of legal-tender and Treasury notes outstanding.

Mr. VEST. It is very evident that we can not conclude the consideration of the question this afternoon, and several of us desire to speak upon this amendment. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 15, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

CORRECTION.

Mr. LANHAM. I rise for the purpose of correcting the Journal. The first portion of it as read states that the communication from the President of the United States with reference to the boundary line between the Indian Territory and the State of Texas was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. The statement should be that the reference was to the Committee on Territories. That was the order made yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made. If there be no objection, the Journal as corrected will be approved.

There being no objection, the Journal was then approved.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS BY OVERFLOW OF OHIO RIVER.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to make a report from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to have read at the Clerk's desk a brief telegram in regard to the flood on the Ohio River and its tributaries.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] rises to make a report from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I hope my colleague will allow this brief telegram to be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it in regard to the floods on the Ohio River?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is just the subject upon which I wish to make a report. I am instructed by the unanimous action of the Committee on Appropriations to ask the passage of the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will my colleague, pending the consideration of that joint resolution, allow this telegram to be read?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. As soon as the resolution is reported the Chair, if there be no objection, will have the telegram read. The resolution which the gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to report for immediate consideration will be read subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution making further appropriations for the relief of destitute persons in the districts overflowed by the Ohio River and its tributaries.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the further sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the relief of such destitute persons as may require assistance in the districts overflowed by the Ohio River and its tributaries, in the manner provided for in the joint resolution entitled "A joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue rations for the relief of destitute persons in the district overflowed by the Ohio River and its tributaries, and making an appropriation to relieve the sufferers by said overflow," approved February 12, 1884, and in further aid of the purposes contemplated by said joint resolution.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution H. Res. 160; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the telegram sent to the desk by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

RICHMOND, IND., February 14, 1884.

To DANIEL W. VOORHEES, BENJ. HARRISON, THOMAS M. BROWNE, Washington, D. C.:

Richmond appropriates $5,000, and a citizens' meeting adopted this:

Resolved, That our representatives in Congress be requested and urged to do all in their power to secure an appropriation as large as possible by Congress to aid the sufferers from the present flood in the Ohio River and its tributaries.

JOHN L. RUPE, Mayor.
C. C. BINKLEY, Secretary.

Mr. MOREY submitted the following telegram:

MILFORD, OHIO, February 14, 1884.

To Hon. H. L. MOREY, Washington, D. C.:

See Secretary Lincoln and ask for relief for our county. Five thousand people are homeless. Relief committee is established, as Batavia supplies will not reach the destitute from the river as well as from here. Town authorities in river towns are busy looking after our families. Large number of sufferers back on hills, and boats can't reach them. Telegraph communication cut off from river towns.

HOMER NORRIS,
Mayor Batavia, Ohio.
M. W. HOLTEN.
P. J. NICHOLS.
A. T. COWAN.
P. F. SWING.
C. W. PEGG.
S. A. WEST.
J. S. PARROTT.

Mr. McCORMICK submitted the following telegram:

PORTSMOUTH, OHIO, February 15, 1883.

Hon. JNO. W. McCORMICK:

City entirely under water, except part of two squares. No tongue can describe the misery and want of our people. Please look after us in the distribution of funds appropriated by Congress.

J. S. PALLITT, Relief Committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. Multitudes of telegrams have been received from the Ohio Valley. I desire only to state that this appropriation is made upon the basis suggested by the Secretary of War. I feel confident that no gentleman wishes to discuss the merits of this measure. The fearful calamity, involving the suffering and ruin of a great multitude of our people, which demands and justifies this legislation, and the imperative demand for prompt and immediate relief are matters within the knowledge of every member of the House. I therefore call the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the previous question on the passage of this joint resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, there being only 13 votes in the affirmative.

Mr. BEACH. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BEACH. This is an appropriation bill, or rather as I think a misappropriation of the public funds——

The SPEAKER. Discussion is not in order.

Mr. BEACH. What I desire to know is whether upon a bill of this character we are not entitled to the yeas and nays as a matter of right.

Mr. HOLMAN. That rule only applies to general appropriation bills.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. This it not a general appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The rule does not require the yeas and nays to be taken upon the passage of any appropriation bill except the general appropriation bills.

The question being taken on the passage of the joint resolution, there were—ayes 106, noes 22.

Mr. YORK. No quorum.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. BEACH as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 136, noes 28.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the report from the Committee on Elections in the case of Chalmers vs. Manning.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is it not in order at this time to raise the question of consideration against the election case in behalf of the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. It is, as this is private bill day, but it will require a vote of two-thirds.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let me inquire how long it is the intention of the gentleman from Georgia having charge of the election case to continue the discussion? And I wish to say that I have no desire to antagonize measures of this kind when it can be prevented, but it is eminently proper there should be some consideration given to private claimants. I hope if the House does go on with the election case it will be disposed of as speedily as possible, so we may go to the Private Calendar to-day. How long does the gentleman from Georgia propose to let the discussion continue before he calls for the previous question?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee that it is my purpose and I now give notice I shall call for the previous question at the end of the second hour after the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] has addressed the House. That is to say, in two hours and twenty-five minutes I shall call for the previous question.

Mr. McMILLIN. That virtually consumes the whole day, and I feel constrained at least to give the House the opportunity to proceed to the consideration of the Private Calendar if it shall feel disposed to do so. I therefore raise the question of consideration against the election case.

Mr. CALKINS. We could not hear when it was intended to call the previous question.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. In two hours and twenty-five minutes.

Mr. CALKINS. That will be at 3 o'clock.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. That will take up the whole day.

Mr. McMILLIN. It will consume the whole day, as there is to be an hour closing the debate after that.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. And then we shall have disposed of only the prima facie case.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House proceed to the consideration of the election case?

The House divided; and there were—ayes 103, noes 36.

So the motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. WARNER, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. 2555) to change the name of "The National La Fayette and Bank of Commerce" to that of "The National La Fayette Bank;" when the Speaker signed the same.

CUSTOMS EMPLOYÉS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting statements showing the number of customs districts in each State and Territory of the United States and in the District of Columbia, the number of officers and employés in each district, &c., in compliance with the resolution of the House of January 24, 1884; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

ANDREW HILLYER.

On motion of Mr. WAIT, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House, without leaving copies, of the papers in the case of Andrew Hillyer, presented to Congress in the year 1820 and now withdrawn for historical purposes.

ASSUMING TO BE UNITED STATES OFFICERS.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 4993) making it a felony for a person to falsely and fraudulently assume or pretend to be an officer or employé acting under the authority of the United States or any Department thereof, and prescribing the penalty therefor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

CONTESTED ELECTION—CHALMERS VS. MANNING.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia calls up as the regular order the unfinished business, which is the consideration of the report of the Committee on Elections on the contested-election case of J. R. Chalmers vs. Van H. Manning, from the second Congressional district of Mississippi. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] is entitled to the floor for fifteen minutes.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I concur with the majority report of the Committee on Elections in the conclusion that under the resolution of reference, giving due consideration to all the papers referred, Mr. Manning should not be sworn in as a member pending the contest on the merits of the case.

Under existing law the Clerk of the preceding Congress makes up the roll of the Representatives-elect, and in doing this he is in the first instance the sole judge of the authenticity and regularity of the credentials of the members. From his decision the aggrieved party must appeal to the House.

In making up the roll for the Forty-eighth Congress the Clerk did not enroll any one as a Representative for the second district of Mississippi, for the reason that no paper which in his opinion could be considered a certificate of election in the sense of the law had been presented to him. In support of this position the Clerk, in an extended statement, set forth the papers that had been filed with him, and concluded:

If the governor of Mississippi issued a certificate of election to any one, based upon the canvass made by the secretary of state on the 18th of November, 1882, for the second district, it has not been presented to the Clerk, who submits to the House the papers in his possession, with his reasons for having failed to enroll any one.

After the organization of the House the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE], after having read at the Clerk's desk the certificate of the election of Mr. Manning, offered a resolution that he immediately qualify as a member of the House as a Representative of said district. Had this resolution been pressed to a decision I have no doubt that under the precedents, the law, and the power inherent in the House, and controlled by the only evidence that could properly come before it at that stage of the case, it would very properly have been adopted.

The House, in its individual as well as its aggregated capacity, fully understood this. Why, then, did not the House pass this resolution? Already the certificate, having the great seal of Mississippi, had been read at the Clerk's desk. It was regular in form and complete in substance, and unqualifiedly declared the election of Mr. Manning. Already the other members-elect from Mississippi had been qualified on precisely similar commissions. The great majority of the members of this House are lawyers by profession, and the question presented was purely a legal one. If the House in no instance can look beyond the certificate in deciding the prima facie case, why did it hesitate? Do I err in saying that it hesitated because a great majority of the members believed that the certificate, although in due form, had been illegally issued upon a fraudulent and false return; and that the secretary of state of Mississippi, in canvassing the returns, was in contempt of a writ of prohibition from the judge of a State court, and that these illegal, false, and fraudulent acts of the secretary of state were well known to the governor of Mississippi at the time he issued said certificate? In this belief the House declined to adopt the resolution referred to, but subsequently adopted the following:

Resolved, That the certificate and all other papers in the contested-election case of J. R. Chalmers vs. Van H. Manning, from the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi, be referred to the Committee on Elections when appointed, with instructions to report immediately whether, upon the prima facie case as presented by said papers, said Manning or Chalmers is entitled to be sworn in as a member pending the contest on the merits, and not to affect the final right to said seat.

This resolution, unanimously and considerately adopted, referred to the committee not only the certificate but "all other papers in the contested election" which in any way could shed any light "upon the prima facie case as presented by said papers." If it was the intention of the House that nothing but the certificate should be referred, as contended here by the minority, why refer "all other papers" in the case? Already it had been read at the Clerk's desk; it was signed by the proper officer; it clearly showed that Manning had been adjudged to have been duly elected by the officer on whom the law of Mississippi imposed the duty of ascertaining and declaring the result; it bore on its face the great seal of the State; it lacked nothing in form. Why refer it? Was this House so obtuse that it could not read the law of Mississippi, and then having read this certificate decide without the aid of the advice of the Committee on Elections whether or not it was in due form? Can it be possible that it is as ignorant of the laws regulating the election of its own members as the gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] asserted it was of the laws of evidence? Why refer the certificate alone? Was the passage of the resolution finally adopted a farce, a mere by-play, a deception, a blind? Why, sir, it has been currently reported that the resolution finally adopted was devised and formulated in a caucus after mature deliberation. Sir, I deny that when this resolution was first adopted it was intended as a cheat and a snare. It was currently reported and generally believed that the certificate of the governor of Mississippi was fraudulent; that it was based upon a false certificate; that at the time the secretary of state certified a return to the governor showing that Van H. Manning had received a majority of the votes in the second Congressional district of Mississippi he knew it was untrue in fact; and believing this the House refused to accept the certificate of the governor as verity, and referred not only it but all the papers that would shed any light on this certificate to the committee. This the House did in the broadest, fullest sense.

In pursuance of the action of the House the committee took up the papers, and only those, which bore upon the issuing of the certificate. On examining the statement of the canvass made out by the secretary of state of the vote polled November 7, 1882, for Representative in the Forty-eighth Congress from the second Congressional district of Mississippi, it was patent that the secretary of state had committed a gross error in computing the vote for Tate County, one of the counties in the district; and a further inspection of the papers show that he committed the error premeditatedly, knowingly, and fraudulently. I do not make these statements at random. This whole matter of the issuing of this certificate was examined by one of the State courts of Mississippi, and the court says that the declaration of election was given by the secretary of state to the governor in favor of Van H. Manning after the service of a prohibitory order of the court upon him, and contrary to the facts as disclosed in the official statement transmitted to him by the commissioners of election of the several counties comprising the said Congressional district. The court further said in this case, wherein Chalmers was plaintiff and the secretary of state respondent:

That the plaintiff, James R. Chalmers, as shown upon the face of the statement transmitted to the secretary of state by the commissioners of election of the several counties composing the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi, was duly elected on the 7th day of November, 1882, at an election then held in said Congressional district, as the Representative from and for said district to the Forty-eighth Congress of the United States. And it was the duty of the secretary of state, on the 18th day of November last, upon the face of said return, to have further so ascertained on the summing up of the whole number given for the candidates, and to have declared the plaintiff, James R. Chalmers, duly elected, and to have presented to the governor at that time his certificate and declaration accordingly.

This decree was made in January, 1883. Bear in mind that the secretary of state did not issue his certificate and declaration to the governor until November 22, 1882, and the committee held that the face of the returns on the 18th of November, 1882, clearly showed Chalmers's election.

Sir, no man can inspect these papers without coming to the conclusion that the secretary of state acted fraudulently in this transaction. His declaration to the governor of Mississippi that J. R. Chambless received 1,472 votes in Tate County and that J. R. Chalmers received none, was so flagrant that the deception ought to be patented, so that no other officer or board in any other State on whom the law imposes the duty of ascertaining and declaring the result of an election can use it without infringement. Stupidity never suggested such a fiction. It was the invention of a fertile imagination and an apathetic conscience. Did he knowingly commit error? Did he willfully certify incorrectly? Did he fraudulently certify this result to the governor of Mississippi? Who denies that he did all these things? Was he not warned by a judicial tribunal to halt? It is no answer to this to say that the committee had no jurisdiction in this matter. I care not whether it had or not. The gist of the matter is his conduct, his knowledge, and the fraud perpetrated.

But we are not left to the judgment of the committee alone. Mr. Manning, the intended beneficiary of this falsification of the returns, declares that these 1,472 votes were in fact cast for Chalmers; that the inspectors and clerks of the several election precincts did certify to the county commissioners of election in their respective counties that he (Chalmers) received a majority of the votes cast, and further said:

And in this connection I state that because of said error to your prejudice I will not take a seat in said Congress or ask the Clerk to enroll my name as a member thereof until I have vindicated and the House shall have affirmed my right thereto.

This was a manly declaration, and I honor the head and heart of the man, I honor the man, who thus sorely tempted refused and cast aside a certificate based upon fraud.

But, sir, what does the minority of this committee ask this House to do? To shut our eyes to all these papers which cast dishonor on this certificate; to turn aside from devious paths trod by this secretary of state, and linger only in the governor's mansion where the final certificate was made up, although satisfied that the certificate to Mr. Manning, presented by the minority, is based upon fraud; agree with them that his credentials are in due form, issued by lawful authority, and that he be sworn in to occupy a seat pending the contest on its merits. Has this House no power to frustrate such a fraud as this is admitted to be? Are we without remedy? Is not this House the sole judge of the election, qualification, and returns of its members? Does the majority report violate any law or precedent? Is not this an exceptional case? Where is its parallel? Will some member of the committee cite one if it can be found in the books?

McCrary on Elections, section 217, says:

Whenever it appears upon the face of a certificate of election that one or more of the counties composing the district have been omitted from the canvass, it is the duty of the House, before determining the prima facie case, to inquire into the effect of such omission upon the result of the canvass, and to treat the certificate as prima facie, good only in case it appears that the omitted vote would not change the result or contradict the certificate if admitted.

If it is true, as claimed by a majority of the committee, that the resolution of reference properly referred the certificate of the secretary of state, and the original certificate of the commissioners of election of Tate County, and from which the governor of Mississippi made up the certificate of Mr. Manning, why may we not scan them under the above authority, giving to it a fair construction? The very certificate upon which the governor acted disclosed the fact that the vote of Tate County had been so manipulated by the secretary of state as to do greater violence to the electors than if it had been entirely omitted, for the vote for Manning was counted, while the vote of Chalmers was omitted, thus accomplishing a double wrong. Looking at the paper before the secretary of state from the commissioners of Tate County, we are forced to the conclusion that he knowingly, willfully, and fraudulently misstated the vote of said county. In letters and figures the commissioners certified that J. R. Chalmers received in said county 1,472 votes; the secretary certified that he received none. It was a palpable error. What the governor knew of this false certification is obvious from the guarded language of his certificate. He says:

Whereas it appears by the returns received at the office of the secretary of state, as certified to me by that officer, that Van H. Manning is duly and constitutionally elected to the office of Representative in and to the Forty-eighth Congress from the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi.

Sir, the very certificate before him was sufficient to put him upon his guard if he had been in entire ignorance of the exciting election in said district. "Chalmers no votes in Tate County? Why, Mr. Secretary, how is this?" asks the governor. And then the secretary, in a voice both "child-like and bland," informs him that if he will look further he will observe that the votes not cast for Manning in Tate County were cast for J. R. Chambless! Simple governor! Innocent secretary! What a "pair to draw to" in the old "shoe-string" district of Mississippi!

Whenever it appears upon the face of a certificate of election that the vote of a county has been omitted from the canvass, investigate, says McCrary, before determining the prima facie case.

Whenever the certificate of the governor and the certificate of the secretary of state upon which the governor acted show that the vote of a county instead of being omitted has been willfully, grossly, and outrageously perverted, do not investigate, say the minority of the committee.

What will the House say? Will it follow the report of the majority, the minority, or the course marked out by the resolution of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN]? He asks—

That the question of a prima facie right to a seat on this floor involved in the contested-election case of James R. Chalmers vs. Van H. Manning, from the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi, be recommitted to the Committee on Elections, with instructions to ascertain and report immediately to this House whether a certificate of election to the office of Representative from said district to the Forty-eighth Congress was issued by the proper authority, as required by the laws of the State of Mississippi and of the United States, to any one; and, if so, to whom.

Why recommit? What information does the House require that it does not have already? The certificate is already before the House. Gentlemen know that it is in due form. Why, then, shirk our duty? Let the House meet the responsibility. It owes it to the country; it owes it to the purity of the ballot; it owes it to fair dealing; it owes it to the integrity of its own organization to manfully face the issue and put the seal of condemnation upon trickery, conspiracy, and fraud in these united efforts to debauch and defile elections and cheat and defeat the expressed will of the electors.

The country is sick of this unequal contest in the Southern portions of our country. The idea is prevalent in many sections of the nation that elections in many of the Southern States are a farce.

It is time to call a halt. Let us draw the line on the second district of Mississippi, and I am glad that the chairman of the Elections Committee, although hailing from the accused section, has cast aside partisanship. I am glad that over against the remarks of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania [Messrs. CURTIN and ELLIOTT] I can quote the patriotic language of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] when closing his remarks in this case two days ago, and I commend them to all the Representatives, without distinction of party, without distinction of section. He said:

Allow me to say that there is no question in my judgment which can come before this House which ought to arrest more of the serious attention of Representatives than the question which is now under consideration.

It is a matter of the gravest public concern. It is not a question which concerns alone the supremacy of a particular political party in the State of Mississippi. It is not a question so narrow even as the limits of a great State. It is a question which involves in its scope the character and the judicial precedents of a great party.

I have endeavored in this case to divest my mind of every consideration of partiality on the one hand or prejudice on the other, for I admit that I felt both. I had the difficult duty of keeping along that narrow line which, as I think, forms the boundary between right and wrong. Casting aside temptation on the one hand and on the other, I have endeavored in such consideration as I have been able to give this case to hold aloft the banner of the majority in popular elections.

In the consideration of an election contest, in which we approach the only majesty in this country and bow before the footstool of the highest sovereignty, we ought to uncover our heads and leave behind us the fouling dust of the campaign. [Applause.]

Brave words fitly spoken! Let this House heed them and be just.

I honor them the more that they come from a political opponent and from a man living in a different section from what I live in. I commend them not alone to the Democratic members on the opposite side of this Chamber, but I commend them as well to my Republican associates. This is no time to stand still when we face here a great wrong that has been committed. Let us meet it not as the gentleman from Pennsylvania would meet it by shirking the responsibility and running. If you can not adopt the majority report, which says, "discharge us from the consideration of this prima facie case;" which says, "we believe that Mr. Manning ought not to be seated on his prima facie right," vote that down and take the manly course recommended by the minority of this committee, and declare that you will seat Mr. Manning pending this contest. Meet the issue squarely. Be men and not shirkers in this case.

Mr. BENNETT. I am in full accord with the views reported to the House by the minority of the Committee on Elections. I yield at this point fifteen minutes of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROADHEAD].

Mr. BROADHEAD. I am obliged to the gentleman from North Carolina for giving me an opportunity to state the reasons for the vote I shall give on the question before this House. The resolution by which this case was referred to the Committee on Elections is very broad in its scope. It refers not only the certificate but all other papers in the contested-election case of Chalmers against Van H. Manning to that committee, with instructions to report from the certificate and all other papers who is entitled to a seat prima facie on the floor of this House. I am not disposed to blame the committee, Mr. Speaker, for having gone into an investigation of all the papers, because that committee was instructed to examine all the papers which were submitted to them for consideration. But we are not bound by their action.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] who addressed the House yesterday declared that this House has the absolute right of referring to the Committee on Elections any papers which in its judgment it may think proper so to refer. Mr. Speaker, I deny that proposition. It is true that according to the provisions of the Constitution this House is to judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its own members. But how is it to judge? Not arbitrarily. Not according to its own will and pleasure. But it must judge and can judge in this country only by the modes known to the law. I maintain there are only two modes, two constitutional and legal modes, by which the question of the right of a member to a seat on this floor can be determined. The first is upon the credentials presented by the member from the State which has elected him. The second is upon a contest, which is to be tried and determined by the mode and under the authority of the act of Congress prescribing the manner of trying contested-election cases.

The same Constitution to which the gentleman has referred declares that—

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations.

This is the foundation of the authority of the State officers to act and to furnish the evidence as to who has been elected under the State laws.

In the absence of any act upon the part of Congress the Legislatures of the different States have prescribed the mode and manner in which an election shall be held for members of Congress. They have provided how the election shall be held, and they have provided what officer under the State government shall give the final certificate as to the result of the election; and those are the credentials which prima facie in each case entitle a member to a seat on this floor.

This Government, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in the passage of the law providing for the organization of this House, has declared in the thirty-first section of the revised code the manner in which the Clerk of the House shall act. It provides that the Clerk of the House of Representatives shall make a list of members whose credentials show that they have been elected according to the laws of the State they propose to represent. There is the declaration of the law. It is true it is made to bind the Clerk and to direct his action. This is done as a matter of convenience, but it is declaratory of the principle upon which this Government is founded and of the rules which should guide this House in determining such cases as the one now brought before it. The States have prescribed the manner in which the election can be held because the Congress of the United States has failed to make any regulations in regard to it. And so long as it is left to the States we must be governed by the action of the States and controlled by the evidence which the State laws have provided as showing who has been elected; and this in the very nature of things precludes any further inquiry as to who is primarily entitled to a seat on this floor; otherwise we are driven to the necessity of looking into the whole case and determining whether all that has been done has been rightly done.

Now, the highest evidence which is furnished by the State laws is the certificate of the governor or of the proper officer, be it the secretary of state or the governor, whose duty is prescribed by law to give the certificate in regard to that election. That is to all intents and purposes a judicial act. It is true he is a ministerial officer. But it will not do to tell me the ministerial officer may not at some time and is not required to perform judicial functions. There is hardly an officer, ministerial or otherwise, who must not at some time exercise quasi-judicial functions. A sheriff to whom a writ is directed has to determine for himself whether the officer who issues that writ has the authority to do so and has affixed to it the seal of the court. He must determine as a judicial question on his own peril whether he will execute that writ or not—whether it has or has not been rightly issued.

But it is not only a judicial act, it is also one of the very highest character; an act to which is affixed the great seal of the State, importing upon its face its absolute verity.

Now the doctrine of the courts and of the books on this subject, the doctrine of McCrary, to whom so many references have been made during this discussion, is, and all hold the opinion almost without an exception—and the exceptions if any relate to cases having peculiar facts connected with them—that the House has no authority to go behind the certificate, because it is the highest evidence of the prima facie case that can be presented. That certificate, Mr. Speaker, I say is the highest evidence; and it must be adhered to for two important reasons.

In the first place, an adherence to it will prevent confusion and disorganization, because it will be readily seen that if one man may contest that certificate when presented by a party claiming a seat in this House then it may be contested by any other person, and the result of it might be to defeat an organization of the House entirely, if we must in every such case go behind the certificate. We must act, then, upon the certificate for the time being, until the question is decided in a final contest upon the merits of the whole case that the member is or is not entitled to a seat. It must hold good for another reason, because if we undertake to deviate from that certificate we are cast adrift, without any rule to guide us. We are repudiating the authority of the State law, which furnishes the prima facie evidence of election, and we are not acting under the authority of the contested-election law of Congress. Where are we to land if we admit the right to question it? Is there any point after we leave the certificate to which we can properly go without investigating the whole case upon its merits? Would it not be doing a wrong to those claiming the seat as well as to the people who are entitled to representation to stop short of such an investigation? In doing less than this you are only half trying the case, and what is tried is done without the sanctions and safeguards which are necessary to the ascertainment of the truth, and without which justice can never be obtained in the investigation and determination of the rights of parties before any tribunal.

In this particular case, for example, which we are now considering all the papers are referred to this committee. What papers? Here is a pamphlet published as coming from the committee, consisting of telegraphic dispatches, tally-sheets, judgments of courts, returns of officers, returns of canvassing boards, letters, and depositions. How many of these papers were to be considered by the Committee on Elections, and what sanction is there to give them validity and entitle them to be used as evidence? Where was the committee to stop? Are they to take into consideration everything connected with the case? If so, then they try the case on its merits by trying the prima facie case, and without being governed by the rules prescribed by law in contested-election cases. It will thus be seen, Mr. Speaker, that so soon as you pass from the certificate you are thrown into absolute confusion, and there is no stopping-place between the point of the submission of the certificate and the final decision of the House upon the question of who is upon the merits of the case entitled to the seat. That is the reason that a strict adherence to this principle to which I have adverted should govern the House, for this House is as much bound by the law as any citizen is bound by the law. But the papers were referred to the committee in an informal and unauthorized way, and the whole question has been considered, and this report is presented to the House under the authority of the resolution directing the committee to take this action. As I said before, the committee is not to blame.

What then follows? Simply this, and I feel a great deal of diffidence in making the declaration, that the House committed a mistake in passing the resolution. They undertook to do what I think they had no right to do. Now, the matter is not what may have been the conduct of General Manning here. We have a question that rises above any consideration that applies to him. That question is the right of the people to be represented on this floor. The second district of Mississippi is entitled to a Representative on the floor of this House. A member who is selected to fill that position can only deprive the people of that district of such representation by resigning his seat. Mr. Manning has not resigned. And admit if you please that he committed a mistake in saying he would not present the certificate at a particular time; he comes now and presents the certificate as a Representative, and as such is entitled to have it properly considered by this House. He comes with a certificate, which is the highest act of the highest officer of the State of Mississippi, which shows according to the laws of that State that he is entitled to a seat here.

It is true that we have a right to determine, as perhaps the Clerk would have the right to determine in making up the roll, whether it is executed in accordance with the laws of Mississippi, because, as I say, the thirty-first section of the revised code expresses what is the law on this subject as applicable to this House as well as to the Clerk of the House. The credentials which he presents show prima facie that he was elected according to the laws of Mississippi. But, as I have said, we have the right to inquire whether that certificate is in accordance with the laws of the State. Beyond that we have no authority to go. If the certificate when presented is impeached, then that presents another consideration, and it becomes the duty of the House to investigate the question by the reference of the credentials to the proper committee. It is their duty to determine whether it is in proper form, whether it is in accordance with the laws of Mississippi, whether it is a forgery or not, or whether it is executed by the person who purports to execute it; and that is all we can do, in my humble judgment, under the powers which the Constitution has vested in us. And I say then that whatever may have been the conduct of Mr. Manning, it matters not; and I am not here to apologize for him. I am here to vindicate the laws of my country and to maintain the rights not only of the people of the second Congressional district of Mississippi, but of every other district of every State of this Union to representation upon this floor.

And I maintain no man can without resigning his position shield himself from the responsibilities that rest upon him as a Representative of the sovereign people. He may have come to the conclusion that he committed an error, and wishes to correct it. But, however that may be, he presents the certificate to this House, and we must accept this as conclusive. And the question was truly and properly presented by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE], who when this House was first organized offered a resolution to the effect that Mr. Manning having the certificate from the governor of the State of Mississippi which entitled him to a seat upon this floor should be seated. It should have been acted on then and there, unless it was objected to. It was objected to, and it was proper then, under the circumstances, for the House to refer it to a committee to inquire whether the certificate was according to the laws of Mississippi.

The certificate and all the papers having been referred to the Committee on Elections, I say that I am not here to blame the committee. It acted under instructions from this House, and under those instructions it was required to investigate the matter. But we of the House are not bound by this action.

Neither am I here to discuss the merits of the respective reports made by the majority and the minority of the Committee on Elections. I say that adopting the resolution now before the House, which proposes to strip this case of all extrinsic evidence, to refer it back to the committee on the certificate alone, and let the committee inquire whether the certificate is in due form and has been issued by the proper authority, is all that we can do and all that we ought to do in this case in accordance with the laws of the country and the provisions of the Constitution applicable to the case.

I have nothing more to say on this subject, and thank the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT] for the opportunity he has given me to explain my position on this question.

Mr. BENNETT. I now yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] for ten minutes.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, there can be no question in the mind of any gentleman on this floor that the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi is entitled to the Representative whom it has elected. The question of who is entitled to represent that district on this floor is a twofold question. The first is, who has what is very often called here the prima facie right? And that question of prima facie right is, really, who is entitled by the return to hold a seat on this floor as the Representative from this district? The other branch of the question is this: Who, notwithstanding the return, was really elected? And the Constitution recognizes this twofold aspect of the question when it declares that each House shall be the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

The question, then, who has the prima facie right to be here resolves itself into this: Who has the return? Then, notwithstanding the resolution of the question who has the return, the question is referred to the Committee on Elections of who was really elected; and the evidence bearing upon this twofold aspect of the question is referred to the Committee on Elections.

Much evidence which is relevant to the question of election is irrelevant and impertinent to the question of return; and evidence which is relevant to the question of return may become very immaterial on the question of election.

I hold that when the Committee on Elections was charged by this House with the duty of determining who is prima facie entitled to a seat on this floor from the second Congressional district of Mississippi as well as who was elected, it was bound to keep those two questions absolutely distinct and separate, and to apply the evidence which was referred to them bearing upon the question of return without bringing in any evidence which was pertinent or relevant to the question of election.

There is no doubt, and my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] admitted it yesterday in his very able argument, that Mr. Manning has the return under the great seal of the State of Mississippi. He has, then, the prima facie right which you, Mr. Speaker, and I have to a seat on this floor. And this House cannot deny him that right without denying the State the right of representation which the Constitution gives it.

Now how does my distinguished friend from Massachusetts say that he gets over that? Why, sir, on considering the question of the return, he says that he will pick up a little fragment of evidence which has been referred to the committee, but which is really not relevant to the question of return, but bears on the question of election—he will pick up this little fragment of evidence and hitch it onto the evidence which belongs exclusively to the question of return and in that way overturn the return.

I hold that this House can do no such thing. We are to decide the question of return upon the evidence which is pertinent and relevant to that question, and only upon such evidence as is pertinent and relevant to it.

Now, what is the evidence which is relevant to that question? The tally-sheets? They had nothing to do with it. The tally-sheets are proper evidence in determining the question of who was really elected; but the tally-sheets had nothing to do with and are utterly irrelevant to the question of who has the return.

The question of who has the prima facie right to hold a seat on this floor from the second Congressional district of Mississippi is the question of who has the right to the return and who has the return. There is no doubt about that, and there is only one piece of evidence upon that subject. That evidence is the certificate of the governor, which says that Van H. Manning was elected.

Now, is there any one here who denies—I do not understand my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] to deny—that if Mr. Van H. Manning had brought that certificate into this House, or were now to bring it into this House, and claim to be sworn in as a Representative of the State of Mississippi upon the broad seal of the Commonwealth, that right would have to be given to him? Could you deny him the right by saying, "There is a little piece of evidence down there which shows that you ought not to have this certificate." Not at all. You determine the question of return upon the only evidence which is pertinent to that issue. Having determined that question, you put him in his seat, and then you refer to the Committee on Elections the question, was he really elected, despite the return?

I have no interest in this matter except that this House shall not make a decision which will be a bad precedent for the future. I say that if we will confine ourselves to the single question of who has the prima facie right, or, in other words, who has the right to be returned as a member from that district, the matter is at an end, and Mr. Manning has to be sworn in, and this House can not deny it. The question of who was elected is a question of future consideration; and in considering that question we can properly go into the tally-sheets and all these other matters of evidence and the declaration of Mr. Manning upon the subject.

This question whether Van H. Manning has a right to waive his right to a seat on this floor is not the proper mode of stating the proposition. The true mode is this: Has Mr. Van H. Manning the right to waive the title of the people of the second district of Mississippi to their right of representation upon this floor?

He is not the only party here. The distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] said yesterday that if a man in a court of equity puts into his answer a statement it may be used in evidence against him. That is true. But my friend knows very well that the answer of one defendant in chancery can not be read against his co-defendant. The parties to this issue are not only Van H. Manning as Representative but the constituency whom he proposes to represent; and his answer can not be read as evidence against the right of that constituency to say: "Van H. Manning is our Representative, and we ask that he be sworn in upon the return." Look at the effect——

Mr. LOWRY. Will the gentleman pardon an interruption?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOWRY. The point I endeavored to make was this: Among the papers on file in this contested-election case is an answer filed by Mr. Manning, in which he admits that in the county of Tate the contestant received 1,472 votes, which, by a mistake of the scrivener who made out what was called the tally-paper connected with the certificate of the commissioners of election, were returned as cast for Chambless, instead of Chalmers; and he declared that he does not intend to take advantage of this mistake to the prejudice of Mr. Chalmers. This answer on file among the papers is distinguished from the evidence which has been referred to. There is, as I hold, a clear distinction in law and equity well known to the profession that the papers in a case do not include the evidence.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] has expired.

Mr. TUCKER. Then the time of my friend from Indiana has expired, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOWRY. I desire only to say——

Mr. SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. TUCKER. I ask consent to occupy so much additional time as my friend from Indiana has taken from me. [Cries of "Go on!"]

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from Virginia desire?

Mr. LOWRY. I hope my interruption will not be permitted to operate to the prejudice of the gentleman from Virginia.

The SPEAKER. A gentleman occupying the floor can not be interrupted without his consent; and when he consents the interruption must be taken from his time.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I ask that the gentleman from Virginia be allowed, by unanimous consent, three additional minutes.

Several MEMBERS. Five minutes.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Very well; five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the gentleman from Virginia being allowed five minutes more.

Mr. LOWRY. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me, I will conclude the inquiry——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. TUCKER. I can not yield further. I will gladly receive any suggestion from my friend in private.

Mr. BENNETT. I trust that this additional time accorded to the gentleman from Virginia will not be deducted from that to which I am entitled.

The SPEAKER. The additional time has been allowed to the gentleman by unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. If it requires unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia may proceed with his remarks, I ask that the consent may be coupled with the condition that I may have the privilege of putting to him one question.

Several MEMBERS. "Oh, no!"

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Unanimous consent has already been given.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that unanimous consent was given for the gentleman from Virginia to extend his remarks for five minutes.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. What I was desirous of doing was to call the gentleman's attention to the legal rule that an admission in the record is evidence against the party making it?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TUCKER. I beg my friend's pardon; I can not yield.

Now, Mr. Speaker, just see where the action of the committee would place the House in respect to this district. Gentlemen admit that Mr. Chalmers has not the shadow of a claim to a seat on this floor at present. They admit that by the certificate of returns Van H. Manning has an indisputable right to a seat on this floor. And yet by taking a piece of evidence which relates to the question of election, and not of return, they propose to deny him the right on his return to a seat on this floor. Then what becomes of the right of the people of Mississippi? You can not give Chalmers the seat, because he has no prima facie right on a return; and you deny the right to Van H. Manning, though he has a complete return, because there is some evidence that may impinge upon his election.

Now, does not the House see that the effect of such a ruling in this case is absolutely fatal to the right of representation on the part of the people of Mississippi? In God's name, let us permit these people to be represented on this floor by a man entitled upon his return to that seat; and then let us determine hereafter the question whether he is legally entitled by the election to hold that seat.

In a legal point of view, and looking to the equities of the case, which require us not to deny to any people the right of representation on this floor, I have no doubt that Van H. Manning ought to be permitted to take his seat now and hold it until a determination of the question of election. That is his prima facie right; and it is that question we are now undertaking to decide.

Mr. BENNETT. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON].

Mr. SINGLETON. This question has been so fully discussed that were I a Representative from any other State than that of Mississippi I should not add one single word to what has already been said. But it may be expected, and I think it is right and proper, that some one from the State most directly interested in the result of this vote should express as far as understood the views of the people of that State in relation to this matter.

I take it for granted, sir, that this body, like all other bodies organized for the transaction of public business, should have rules of a fixed and permanent character as far as is practicable. And when those rules have been found to operate well in practice we should be slow to amend or to abandon them. If this be true, the rules of the House heretofore applicable to cases of this kind apply with peculiar emphasis to the case now under consideration.

It was early discovered by our fathers that some rule must be adopted by which they could avoid vacancies in seats upon this floor. In every representative government every portion of the people is entitled to have a voice in their legislative proceedings. It was found it would not do to wait until contested-election cases were settled on their merits, because the law requires notice shall be served by the contestant on the contestee; that time shall be given for taking depositions on the one side and the other, and that the testimony taken must go before the Committee on Elections and be considered by that committee, which would necessarily involve months and perhaps a whole session in the consideration of the case. In order to avoid this and prevent the fact of vacant seats upon this floor a rule was early established and a difference was at once drawn between what is termed a case prima facie and a case on its merits—a case de facto and a case de jure. Hence it was that in the early history of the Government it was deemed proper that the party who comes here with a certificate properly authenticated from his own State should at once be entitled to take his seat, and should be sworn in and hold that seat until the case could be determined upon its merits.

In the settlement of this case there are but three points to be considered, namely: First, what constitutes a prima facie case? Second, does the certificate of Colonel Manning bring him within that definition? And third, and lastly, if such be the case, how far can he by any act or omission of his waive his right to a seat on the floor of this House—or rather, I should say, how far can he waive the right of his constituents, 150,000, to be represented in this House?

To simplify this matter as much as possible, and even at the expense of being considered tedious, I must ask the attention of the House to what I shall read from the very highest authority known to this body on the subject of contested-election cases, to wit, McCrary's American Law of Elections. He says, in section 204:

> Where two or more persons claim the same office, and where a judicial investigation is required to settle the contest upon the merits, it is often necessary to determine which of the claimants shall be permitted to qualify and exercise the functions of the office pending such investigation.

That is exactly the case we have before us.

A little further along he says:

> SEC. 205. No particular form of credentials is required. It is sufficient if the claimant to an office presents a certificate signed by the officer or officers authorized by law to issue credentials, and stating generally the fact that the election was duly held and that the claimant is duly elected to the office in question.

In another section I read as follows:

> SEC. 208. It is enough for a prima facie case if the certificate comes from the proper officer of the State and clearly shows that the person claiming under it has been adjudged to be duly elected by the officer or board on whom the law of the State has imposed the duty of ascertaining and declaring the result. And in the case of Kerr vs. Trego (47 Pennsylvania State Reports, 292) it is held that the certificate of election sanctioned by law or usage is prima facie evidence of title to the office, and can only be set aside by a contest in the form prescribed by law.

That is, a contest on its merits.

Now, sir, it is clear to my mind there can be no difficulty so far as the certificate is concerned. It comes from the proper officer. It is in totidem verbis my own certificate, with the exception that the one contains my name and the other contains General Manning's. If my certificate could not be contested under a prima facie view of the case, how does it happen that Mr. Manning's can be contested? The case therefore is clearly within the purview of the law in making out a prima facie case.

To hurry on, how far can Manning by any act or admission of his waive his right to a seat on this floor? Does that seat belong to Mr. Manning or Mr. Chalmers to dispose of as either may deem proper? Can Mr. Manning give away that seat to some one else, or can he by any act of his sell it in the market for gold if he chooses to do so?

Why, sir, he comes here merely as the mouthpiece of 150,000 citizens of my State. He comes here as the medium through which their wishes are conveyed to this House, and he has no power to waive the right or the responsibility which they have vested in him. I find it laid down still further in this same work of McCrary that this House in considering a prima facie right has no power to look beyond the certificate which is presented, and, unless something should appear on the face of the certificate itself which impeaches its integrity, it must be taken as importing a verity, and the House has no power to look aliunde for facts to uphold or discredit it. McCrary says:

> It is to be observed in this connection that while in determining the prima facie right to a seat the House of Representatives will not look behind the certificate if it be signed by the proper officers and if it contains a statement in unequivocal terms of the result of the election, yet something may appear upon the face of the certificate itself to destroy or impair its value as prima facie evidence.

Clearly indicating that nothing outside the certificate itself can be considered by this House; and that, unless there shall appear on the face of that certificate something which impairs its value or invalidates it, it must be taken as implying an absolute verity.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the little time which I have I shall refer to a case much stronger in its features than the one now under consideration, where the party holding the certificate, although there was connected with it a statement from the governor of Texas that he believed the election ought to be declared invalid, or that it should have been determined that no election took place at all; yet, notwithstanding the governor's statement accompanying the certificate, the member holding it was seated, although afterward, when it came to the decision of the case on its merits, he was unseated by the votes of all of the members except his own. Though voted in upon his certificate, the records show there was but one vote in favor of retaining him when the case came to be considered upon its merits. I refer to the case of W. T. Clark, of Texas. Here is the resolution proposing to seat him, which I will read to the House in order to bring it to a proper understanding of the question involved:

Resolved, That W. T. Clark has the prima facie right to a seat as Representative from the third Congressional district of the State of Texas, and is entitled to take the oath of office as a member of this House without prejudicing the right of any person claiming to have been elected thereto to contest his right to said seat upon its merits.

Now I will ask the Clerk to read the certificate from the governor of the State of Texas by which Mr. Clark claimed his seat. I wish to call the special attention of the House to this case, because it is a strong one, and involves a very important question connected with the present controversy. I will also ask the Clerk to read afterward a sentence from the remarks of Mr. HOAR, of Massachusetts, upon the adoption of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

GOVERNOR'S OFFICE,
Austin, November 15, 1871.

This is to certify that on comparison of the returns of votes cast at an election in the third Congressional district of the State of Texas on the 3d, 4th, 5th, and 6th of October, A. D. 1871, provided for by joint resolution of the Legislature of said State of Texas, as approved May 2, 1871, I find that Hon. William T. Clark was duly elected to represent the said Congressional district of the State of Texas in the Congress of the United States for the term commencing on the 16th day of March, A. D. 1871, and ending March 3, 1873.

In giving this certificate, I wish to call attention to the attached certified statement of the vote cast in the third district, as returned, with grounds for rejecting certain returns. This is explanatory of my reasons for giving the foregoing certificate of election. According to my opinion the numerous irregularities and instances of fraud and violence during the election in the third district, reported and proved to my satisfaction, would rather warrant a new election than the giving of a new certificate to either party. I have felt constrained by my interpretation of the provisions of the State law on the subject of elections to reject many returns, and would have thought it more just to regard the election as a nullity. Yet the act of Congress of May 31, 1870, section 22, seems to require that I should give a certificate to one of the candidates.

In testimony whereof I have caused the great seal of the State to be affixed, at the city of Austin, the date herein first above written.

EDWARD J. DAVIS, Governor.

By the governor:

J. E. OLDRIGHT,
Acting Secretary of State.

Mr. SINGLETON. I now ask the Clerk to read from the remarks of Mr. HOAR the extract which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

Now, Mr. Speaker, I undertake to say that the law is this: that a certificate of election given by an officer authorized by law to give it, where it contains nothing more than the declaration that the party to whom it is given was duly elected to an office, is prima facie evidence that a party holding it was duly elected, and has a right to such office.

Mr. SINGLETON. I wish to state to the House briefly, as I see that my time is about exhausted, that in the case to which I have just referred the governor of the State of Texas accompanied the certificate with the statement which has just been read. Mr. HOAR was then a member of the Committee on Elections, and made a speech advocating the seating of the party by the House, although, as I have said, he was thrown out afterwards by the unanimous vote of the House, with one exception. Mr. Manning presents a certificate with no impeachment upon its face, and yet this House refuses to administer the oath to him.

But, Mr. Speaker, I wish to read a little further from this work on elections which I have already quoted. I wish to call attention to this point that has been made, as to the right of a member-elect to relinquish an office once he is elected. McCrary says—

An office may be abandoned by removal from the State, county, or district to which the officer is restricted by the law of his office, or by accepting an incompatible office, or by relinquishment on any express qualification, or by the assumption of any disqualification, or by resignation.

There is no other mode known to the law by which a man can abandon an office which has once been bestowed upon him by the people except as enumerated above. His admissions amount to nothing at all so far as this case is concerned.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word in response to a remark made by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD], in which he, with a grand flourish, produced a newspaper article which he caused to be read from the Clerk's desk, declaring that it was an extract from one of the "leading papers" of the State of Mississippi. I hold a specimen of the paper up before you, leaving yourselves to judge how far that sheet, from its appearance, should influence public sentiment, especially the sentiment of this House, in this contest. This paper is, I believe, about two years old, and it must be apparent to the House that it has not grown very rapidly in size at least.

The article read was thrown in, I suppose, as a mere make-weight, and you can determine what influence it should exercise upon your judgment in casting your votes.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BENNETT. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GEORGE D. WISE].

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I believe, Mr. Speaker, I have the right to claim fifteen minutes. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DAVIS] gives me five in addition. I do not know, however, that I shall occupy even the ten minutes which are kindly yielded to me by my friend from North Carolina.

I do not propose at this late hour to enter into any discussion of the legal questions involved in the issue now before the House. My simple purpose in rising is to state the reasons which shall govern my vote, and also to call the attention of this House to what has been done in reference to the contested-election case from the first district of Virginia. I shall vote upon the prima facie case to seat Mr. Manning. The Committee on Elections has reported that Mr. Chalmers is not entitled to a seat upon this floor, because he holds a commission from nobody. Somebody has a right to represent here the second district of Mississippi. Who is it? There was an election, and the result of it was declared. Either Mr. Manning or Mr. Chalmers has a right to a seat upon this floor, and the people of the second Congressional district of Mississippi have a right to representation here, of which they can not be properly and legally deprived.

All the gentlemen who oppose the resolution offered by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] admit that if Mr. Manning had presented himself at the bar of this House he should have been sworn in without objection, and the committee reports that he holds a commission issued by the governor of Mississippi, bearing the great seal of the State, and otherwise unexceptionable in form. It is admitted that his credentials are as valid as those of any member occupying a seat upon the floor of this House. But as an excuse for a departure from the rule as laid down by Mr. McCrary in his work on elections "that the person holding the ordinary credentials shall be qualified and allowed to act pending a contest and until a decision can be had upon the merits," it is alleged that the resolution referring this case to the Committee on Elections contains an instruction from the House that the prima facie case should be considered in connection with all the papers, the evidence relevant to the question of election as well as that bearing upon the question of return. What is that resolution? It is that the certificate and all other papers in the case of Chalmers vs. Manning be referred to the Committee on Elections, with instructions to report immediately upon the prima facie case, as presented by said papers. To report upon what? Upon the prima facie, as presented by the papers, not upon the merits.

This resolution, fairly construed, contains no instruction to the committee to consider any evidence in the determination of the question whether Mr. Manning or Mr. Chalmers is entitled to be sworn in as a member pending the contest on the merits other than that which bears upon the question of return. And yet every argument delivered upon this floor in opposition to Mr. Manning's prima facie title to a seat is based upon certain admissions made by him in his answer to the notice of contest by Mr. Chalmers. I hold that under the rules of law governing these cases of election this House has no right to go behind the certificate to consider that answer. But if you do, what do you find? Mr. Manning therein denies that Mr. Chalmers has the prima facie or any right to a seat upon this floor as the Representative from the second Congressional district of Mississippi, and declares his own credentials to be legal and valid. If this paper is to be taken into consideration at all, then you must look to the whole of it.

I have authority for the position that in the consideration of the prima facie case you have no right to go behind the certificate. If that is regular, and it comes from the proper officer of the State, and shows that the person claiming under it has been legally adjudged to have been duly elected, it is enough for the prima facie case. (McCrary on Elections, sections 207, 208; and see also Kerr vs. Trego, 47 Pennsylvania State Reports, 292.)

In one case the governor of Pennsylvania, after commissioning Ewing as sheriff of the city and county of Philadelphia, undertook to commission Thompson as duly elected at the same election, and it was held that he had no right to revoke the commission which he had issued, and that the person holding it had thereby acquired a vested right, of which he could only be deprived by judicial decision. (43 Pennsylvania State Reports, 372.) Mr. Manning holds a commission from the governor of Mississippi, whose duty it was to issue it, and upon its face there is nothing to impeach it. In fact the committee in its report says that the commission bears the great seal of the State and is otherwise unexceptionable in form, and that if the inquiry as to the prima facie right to the disputed seat had been confined to that paper alone, they would unhesitatingly have affirmed Mr. Manning's right to occupy it pending the contest.

But, Mr. Speaker, I did not rise for the purpose of going into a legal argument upon this case. Gentlemen on the other side, and notably the gay and festive Representative from Colorado, have put on a pretense of virtuous indignation at the bare thought of seating Mr. Manning when there is a fraud behind his certificate. I will presently call your attention to the case of a member sitting among you exactly similar to this. But before doing so I want to remind you that during the last Congress a gentleman from Massachusetts, now in my eye, a member of the Committee on Elections then and a member of it now, reported to this House a resolution which unseated a member from South Carolina with 9,000 majority, and the frivolous pretext offered for the outrage was that certain colored citizens of the district had been prevented from voting by intimidation.

Mr. RANNEY. Will the gentleman from Virginia allow me——

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Certainly. I am glad the gentleman knew to whom I alluded.

Mr. RANNEY. What case was that?

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I have not got it here.

Mr. RANNEY. There was no occasion on which I made any such report.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I have not got the report here, but if the gentleman desires it I will publish it with my remarks, to show that I have quoted him correctly. And that is the only excuse that you gentlemen, who wear the front of virtuous indignation upon all occasions when a Democrat is to be unseated, gave for putting a man in here who was defeated by 9,000 majority. I thank God I see now in this Hall the Representative from South Carolina whom you turned out. He sat yesterday under the waving of the arm of the eloquent gentleman from Colorado.

But, Mr. Speaker, I rose to call attention to another report from the Committee on Elections. The case from the first district of Virginia was also referred to them, and in that they reached the conclusion that the sitting member is entitled to retain the seat pending the contest on the merits. I will not pause to notice their mistakes. They say that the governor of Virginia issued the certificate to MAYO, when the truth is that he did not, but on the contrary refused to participate in the fraud by which Mr. MAYO was enabled to obtain it from the secretary of the Commonwealth. The governor of Virginia issued no certificate to the gentleman who occupies a seat here as the Representative from the first district of that State, but as a member of the board of State canvassers declined to sign the certification of the fact of his election. I was present, and the governor differs in political sentiments from me, but to his honor be it spoken that the pen dropped from his hand, and he declared that he would not approve the outrage by which all the qualified voters of the county of Gloucester, in the first district of Virginia, were disfranchised. So far from giving Mr. MAYO the certificate, he held that Mr. Garrison ought to have it.

The cases are parallel. Behind the certificate of Mr. Manning there is an error, or a fraud, if it please you to call it so—and behind that of Mr. MAYO there is also a fraud. Gentlemen on the Republican side of this House, who have grown so hot with indignation at the thought of admitting Mr. Manning to sit in our midst, have taken and hugged Mr. MAYO to their bosoms. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HART] have waxed warm and eloquent in their denunciation of fraud, and yet they sit there cheek by jowl with him. He is among and one of you Republicans. He votes with you. He is bone of your bone and flesh of your flesh.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I should like to have a little more time.

Mr. COBB. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed five minutes more.

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. I will yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DAVIS], as the Chair understands, has already yielded five minutes of his time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GEORGE D. WISE], and has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. I will yield five minutes of that time.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I was present when the board of State canvassers was in session and when the abstracts of votes cast in the various counties and corporations forming the first Congressional district of Virginia were examined, and I know that the returns showed that George T. Garrison was elected to this Congress from that district. The county of Gloucester was excluded from the count, and the evidence of that fact is in the record of the case. There was evidence before the Committee on Elections that MAYO holds his seat here by a fraud. Yet the virtuous gentlemen on the other side take him to their bosoms as if he were odorous with the attar of roses. [Laughter.] As I have already said, the proof is before the committee and the House that the governor, as a member of the board of State canvassers, refused to sign the certificate given by that board because he believed the exclusion of the vote of the county of Gloucester to be an outrage. Yet from the beginning of this Congress that gentleman has occupied a seat on the Republican side of this House, and they have given him full fellowship as a political brother. Think of it! You who perpetrate such acts as these to read moral lectures to the Representatives of the American people! God save us from your practices and your teachings! Virginia may be detained for a time in the embraces of a foul and loathsome coalition, held together by the illegal use of Federal patronage and the cohesive power of public plunder, but in the name of justice I demand that the insult shall not be put upon her and her people of a reversal in this case of the judgment rendered in that from my own State.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 160) making further appropriations for the relief of destitute persons in the district overflowed by the Ohio River and its tributaries.

ELECTION CONTEST—CHALMERS VS. MANNING.

The House resumed the consideration of the contested-election case of J. R. Chalmers against Van H. Manning, from the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT] has ten minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BENNETT. I yield five minutes of that time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON].

Mr. VAN EATON. In the five minutes allowed me I propose to present only one or two views; and in fact I could not present more if I wished. I have this to say: Very strangely, it seems to me, this discussion has wandered from the point at issue. To a very great extent those who have discussed the opposite side of this question have depended for their arguments upon that which goes to the merits of the case alone. I stand here to speak simply and alone for the certificate of election held by Mr. Manning. I take the ground that upon the prima facie case this House can not consistently go behind that certificate.

I wish to make this point: In the first place I understand it to be conceded by all that have spoken on both sides of this question that had Mr. Manning come forward to the Clerk's desk when this House was being organized and presented his certificate he must have been sworn in.

A MEMBER. Why did he not do it?

Mr. VAN EATON. I am coming to that. I understand that is admitted on all sides by those who have argued for and those who have argued against his right to take the seat. The point I wish to make right here is this: Gentlemen say that although at that time Mr. Manning had discredited that very certificate he would have been sworn in on it had he presented it. That was a time after Mr. Manning, as gentlemen say, had discredited his certificate. Yet it is admitted he would have been sworn in on it had he presented it.

That very certificate is now before the House. What has occurred from that day to this that he should not now be sworn in on it just as much as he ought, as gentlemen admit, to have been sworn in on it had he presented it the first day of the session? Has anything occurred in the interval to make the certificate of any less validity than it was then? Has there been any change in it in any shape or form? Does it make any difference how that certificate gets before the House; whether Mr. Manning presents it himself or it is presented by a friend?

That certificate is here; it is before the House. We must meet it; we can not help it. Whether we approve of submitting the prima facie case to the committee or do not approve it, no matter how we feel about that, the certificate is here and we must meet the question. I would say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], whom I do not see in his seat, that certificate is the "Banquo's ghost" which rises perpetually before us. It is the very highest evidence that any one can produce before this House.

I take this position—I am forced to do it from all the study I have been able to give the case—that the only consistent course it is possible for this House to pursue is to swear in Mr. Manning on his certificate, now that it is here. I would vote to do it if I knew ten times over that he was never elected; if I knew that the very next day I would vote to unseat him on the merits. When only the prima facie case is here, I would give honor and credit to the act of his State and seat him on the prima facie case, so as to be consistent with the long line of precedents. That is the only course that can strictly be followed to save us from trouble.

I say further, if the Tate County returns were the whole of this case, and if I were voting on the merits, I would not vote to give Mr. Manning the seat on those returns. But, Mr. Speaker, the Tate County returns have no more to do with this prima facie case than any other foreign matter that can possibly be imagined.

Now, gentlemen object to Mr. Manning's being sworn in simply because he did not himself present the certificate. I take the ground, and I ask gentlemen to think of it, that this is a mere sentiment, and not law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. VAN EATON. I hope that the gentleman from North Carolina will allow me half a minute more.

Mr. BENNETT. Half a minute? Yes, sir.

Mr. VAN EATON. Mr. Speaker, I shall, just because I think it is consistent and right, so long as the prima facie case is before this House, vote to recognize the supreme act in this case of the chief executive of my State and seat Mr. Manning upon his certificate. If he should be so seated, I shall hope that the case may speedily come up on its merits. When I come to vote upon that question, without regard to partisan or political feeling, without regard to popularity or unpopularity, help or hurt whom it may, I shall vote for the very right of the case as God gives me to see the right.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not mean to argue this case. I have risen to make an appeal to this House, which I trust will not fall on stony ground. The Committee on Elections is charged with grave and delicate duties. It ought to be above suspicion of partisan bias. It is an open secret that five of the Democrats on the committee concur in the report filed by the minority. Now let facts be given to a candid world. These five gentlemen thought that the resolution did not warrant them in going into the pleadings and evidence involving the merits of the case as distinguished from the prima facie case. For myself, I have not read twenty words of the pleadings and evidence. I have made scrutiny only into Exhibits A, B, C, and D, read by the Clerk on the first day of this session.

Some one is in error—the House in passing this anomalous resolution, or the majority or the minority of the committee in their construction of the resolution. It is wrong to breed discord in this committee by your action of doubtful interpretation. You ought to make your meaning in that resolution clear, so that gentlemen of the committee on either side of this House, especially those of the majority, responsible for legislation, may come together and decide it upon the law of the case. What did you mean by the resolution? Shall we invade the entire case, both upon the merits and prima facie? Shall we traverse the tradition and precedents of this House in the absence of express terms warranting it?

For one, I will say there has been no such unmistakable utterance in that resolution as warranted me in making such invasion. I have, Mr. Speaker, throughout the scrutiny I have made into this case confined myself to the certificate and the exhibits read from the Clerk's desk on the first day of this session; and it is upon these, according to my construction of this resolution, that this case should stand or fall.

Mr. RANNEY. Mr. Speaker, I take the floor as one of the ten members of the Committee on Elections who reported this case on the part of the majority, but I do not propose to occupy my whole hour. At the outset I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE].

Mr. BARKSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I have been a dispassionate and impartial listener to the able discussion of the question before the House. I had not intended to enter the arena of debate. I do not intend to do so now, further than to give the reasons for the vote that I shall cast and to avail myself of the opportunity of offering an amendment to the resolution accompanying the report of the committee.

Reserving my judgment upon the paramount question of the right of the people of the second Congressional district of Mississippi to be represented by the person of their choice when that question comes to be considered upon its merits for final adjudication by the House, I shall upon the question as it now stands cast my vote to declare that the claimant holding the certificate has, in virtue of it, the prima facie right to the seat pending the contest on its merits.

In the course of this discussion prima facie evidence has been defined to be such evidence as of itself is sufficient to establish the fact, if uncontradicted; but is controvertible. Unquestionably that definition is correct; but the prima facie evidence is controvertible when the issue comes to be tried upon its merits to determine whether the person holding the certificate is the duly elected member.

The rule has been established, and confirmed by invariable custom, that the person to whom the certificate has been awarded is entitled to hold and to discharge the functions of the office of Representative until the House, in the exercise of its prerogative as the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members, decides the case on its merits.

Hence the ingenious and labored arguments of gentlemen to show that the certificate of Mr. Manning is founded on a mistake, or error, or fraud, as they may choose to have it, are not applicable to the question as it is now presented to the House. They will be relevant when the question is considered on its merits.

Doubtless, Mr. Speaker, abuses are committed by officials to whom the grave responsibility is intrusted of issuing certificates. Possibly such abuses may have been committed in the present instance. But I submit that to depart from the custom and to set aside the rule before the certificate is judicially decided to be void, is to deprive the House of the very means of ascertaining its membership and of accomplishing or perfecting its organization. McCrary, in his standard work, American Law of Elections, says:

> If the party holding the ordinary credentials to an office could be kept out of the office by the mere institution of a contest, the organization of a legislative body, such for example as the House of Representatives of the United States, might be altogether prevented by instituting contests against a majority of the members, or what is more to be apprehended, the relative strength of political parties in such a body might be changed by instituting contests against members of one or the other of such parties. These considerations have made it necessary to adopt and to adhere to the rule that the person holding the ordinary credentials shall be qualified, and allowed to act pending a contest and until a decision can be had on the merit.

As to Mr. Chalmers, neither the committee, nor any member of the committee, has asserted that he has even the color of a title to a seat pending the contest; and therefore he is not a party to the present proceeding.

I will add that, in view of the extraordinary disclosures contained in the papers relating to the case, the House owes it to its own integrity, to the claimants themselves, and especially to the people of the district, to institute searching and vigorous inquiry into the merits of the case without delay. The right of the people to be represented by the person of their choice overtops all other rights. It is inprescriptible and inalienable, and it is usurpation to deny or to delay its exercise. Let the House make haste to address itself to that question.

I wish to offer an amendment to the resolution reported by the majority of the committee, and to obtain a vote upon it if possible under the rules, which I will ask the Clerk to read. Let the resolution be first read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Resolved, That the Committee on Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the prima facie right to the seat in the contested-election case of J. R. Chalmers vs. Van H. Manning.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Now read the words which I desire to add.

The Clerk read:

> And the case on its merits proceed before the committee, with instructions to report as early as possible.

So that the resolution as amended will read:

> That the Committee on Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the prima facie right to the seat in the contested-election case of J. R. Chalmers vs. Van H. Manning, and that the case on its merits proceed before the committee, with instructions to report as early as possible.

Mr. RANNEY. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER].

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with the greatest attention possible to this discussion, but the difficulty which I find in this case is not answered by gentlemen upon this side of the House. As I understand it, the prima facie case is preliminary to the ascertainment of the real fact which is at issue, and when we are told by the party who presents the certificate, and when it is impossible to ignore or deny as a part of the indestructible record in this case that he was not elected, that the fact upon which his claim rests does not exist, that the governor in counting Tate County as he did counted it wrongfully and by mistake, then he tells us it is impossible for him legally to occupy a seat on this floor and represent that district in the State of Mississippi.

I agree, Mr. Speaker, with all which has been said as to the right of every district in the country to be represented on this floor, but it is a right to be represented by the men of their choice and not by a man whom they did not elect. To say that that right of representation is answered by seating one whom the facts show, and whom the contestant admits, was not elected, instead of the one who was, is to lose sight of the great constitutional right of representation in the subtleties of a prima facie case. Now, sir, there are some things more important than the rights of a prima facie case. Constitutional liberty is much more important. The very object for which all these rules have been quoted, and all the precedents which have been established are aimed at, is to ascertain who was the party elected by the will of the district, by the votes of the district, to be the Representative here.

The main fact is admitted, and now to ask this House to seat contrary to that fact, to seat falsely, to misrepresent that district, is to ask it to do what for the sake of humanity I am glad to see Mr. Van H. Manning himself, the proposed Representative, upon his conscience, dare not attempt to do. And for one, sir, I shall never vote to seat in this House as the Representative of any district any party when the facts which he lays before the House show the main fact of an election was wanting.

But it has been said here that we are bound by precedents. Have precedents come to acquire such force that constitutional liberty is to go down before them? It will be a sad day indeed for the great purposes of the Constitution if the great bulwarks of constitutional liberty and freedom are to give way before the subtleties of argument in a prima facie case.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANNEY. Mr. Speaker, this discussion has been very much prolonged already, and the argument has taken a wide range and been pretty well exhausted. I shall not in the time allotted to me attempt to go over again the whole field of contention, but shall touch generally upon some of the views advanced adversely to the conclusion of the majority of the committee. The real argument of this case lies in a very small compass. Indeed, I had erroneously supposed that a simple statement of the facts as found would, or ought to, suffice. But the adverse contention, and the criticisms made upon the majority report with so much earnestness, seem to require some extended notice in reply.

Much has been said about the general rule which has for a long time obtained in this House, as though it were an inflexible one, grounded upon legal provisions. Permit me to say to the gentlemen who have pressed this contention—and it seems to be the whole substance of the argument—that in my judgment it would have been more appropriately urged when the first resolution was offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE], aimed as it was to seat Mr. Manning on the strength alone of the credentials presented, and to preclude all further inquiry. It seems to be quite out of place now, after the scope of the inquiry has been widened by the withdrawal of that resolution and the substitution of the one under which the committee acted. The House itself departed from that rule at the outset under a conclusion reached that there was proper occasion for such a treatment of this case. It is unbecoming in them now to go back and seek to invoke this rule, and exclude from present consideration the facts which are disclosed by the report made.

It seems to me that the vigorous attempt now in this discussion to make it appear that the last resolution means no more than the first is idle and futile.

But, Mr. Speaker, I propose to answer some of the arguments as applied to this alleged rule. Some appear to think that the practice by which persons presenting the ordinary credentials are admitted to their seats without further proof is in danger of being overthrown. Not so. The roll of membership is made up in the first instance by the Clerk of the next preceding House upon the force of such credentials alone. That practice is secure under an act of Congress; is wise and proper for the purpose of facilitating a speedy organization of the House in the first place. Any person who presents the proper credentials afterwards, in cases where no contest has been instituted, is sure of a ready admission to his seat. An act of Congress has regulated the proceedings in cases of contest; and the House is furnished in advance with all needed information as to whether there is a contest in good faith and of the probable merits of the controversy. So there is no danger of delay from frivolous and unfounded objections. Cases of real contests are alone likely to be laid aside for examination and determination. Hence, there is no real danger of mischief being wrought, as some of our friends on the other side seem to believe, in view of the course which the present case is taking or by any precedent likely to be set by adopting the resolutions proposed by a large majority of the committee.

As to the so-called rule itself, its wisdom is not impugned, although the reasons which gave rise to its adoption exist with much less force now, if they exist at all, since the recent legislation already referred to. Indeed in real contests these reasons have ceased to operate very largely, and it is a serious question whether the evils resulting from its being adhered to now are not more and greater than the good results. For under its operation it oftentimes happens that two salaries, instead of one, have to be paid for one district representation. The rights of the contestant are prejudiced in the contest. The rule is likely to be, yea is, availed of by corrupt officials and partisan canvassing boards, and certificates awarded and obtained in view of the same, they knowing that a prima facie seat so called is often the equivalent in its benefits of a full title. If the rule were not followed, it would serve to hasten the decision in the contest made.

Of the right of the House to do what it did in this case there is no doubt.

This House is made by the Constitution a judicial tribunal, to judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of an alleged member, and when his right to a seat is in dispute and made the subject-matter of a contest the House may determine and pursue its own course of procedure. It has ample authority, and an undoubted right, to hear both sides, as in other judicial proceedings, before allowing the person holding the credentials to occupy the seat claimed. Giving him a seat pending the contest on the faith that attaches as a presumption in the first instance to the certificate is not a matter of legal right at all, but is at best only the practice or usage of the House, founded on reasons of policy and convenience, and not guaranteed by the Constitution, statutes, or the standing rules of the House even. The certificate produced is held in practice to be prima facie evidence of the person having been elected, and that is taken for the time being and for present purposes sufficient proof. Gentlemen seem to lose sight of the fact that the certificate is at best only evidence, and persist in treating it as an instrument which confers a right to a seat, an instrument which of itself constitutes a title, the same as if the governor who gave it under the great seal of the State appointed or elected a Representative. I need not again assure members that this is not so. It is altogether otherwise. To speak of "a prima facie title or right" in that sense is a misnomer. It is a looseness of expression, when all that is meant or implied is that the certificate is prima facie evidence. The House is under no legal obligation to adopt or follow such a practice or usage unless it sees fit to do so. It will, of course, always do it when there is not some existing good reason to the contrary. But what I wish to emphasize is that the seat thus given conditionally under that usage is not as an absolute right.

It has been usual in anomalous and in extraordinary cases, calling for such a course, to vary or depart from the general rule of practice. It rests entirely in the judgment and discretion of the House whether they will adopt one course or another. In the present case, as I shall hereafter show more fully, the contestee precluded himself from the benefits of the rule, the House at his own request took the case out of its operation. Instead of retracing its steps, as some of my friends on the other side would desire to have the House do, in view apparently of the unpalatable facts disclosed, I for one insist that it is a good time and a suitable occasion not only to rebuke an unfaithful State official, but to emphasize the doctrine that the people alone are to choose Representatives in Congress, and not the secretary of state or any other State official, and that it is not within the authority or province of this House to choose one for temporary occupancy of a seat to the end that no district shall be unrepresented while the contest is going on.

There is no right on the part of a minority because they have tried and failed to elect their candidate to have him seated temporarily merely because otherwise the district will not be represented, especially under the disclosed facts of this case.

Now, what did the House mean when it referred this case to the committee? You did not refer the case to the committee asking them to find out whether Mr. Manning had a prima facie case. You referred it to the committee instructing them to report whether upon the prima facie case, as presented by the papers, all of the papers, he was entitled to be sworn in. If it appears from examination that he was not elected, if it so appears conclusively, how can you say that he is "entitled" to be sworn in? How can he be so entitled by right or by law?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Will you permit me to read an authority on this subject?

Mr. RANNEY. I have no time to yield, and I beg the gentleman not to interrupt me. Now, the effect of that reference was to ask the committee whether, under the circumstances and facts of this case as proven by the papers referred, we should permit a man to take a seat as a matter of grace or courtesy under the ordinary rule or otherwise.

For instance, suppose Mr. Manning came forward here with a certificate and said: "Here is a certificate signed by the governor; it has got the great seal attached to it; it is in due form; but I am not elected; I want to sit here a while and draw my pay, but I do not pretend that on the trial of the merits of this case I can be shown to have been elected or to be entitled to have the seat permanently." Would you permit him to take a seat and occupy it?

I shall send to the Clerk's desk an amendment to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN]. If the committee will examine under it, I think they will find that in this case it appears on the record that Mr. Manning does not himself pretend that he was elected; can not reasonably contend that on the proofs adduced he establishes that fact. My amendment is intended to embrace that issue if the case is recommitted.

If that is so, and I take it now as an illustration, will gentlemen say there is such a legal right existing here as would entitle a man to a seat by courtesy or on what we call a prima facie right—a seat temporarily in this House—when he does not pretend that he has been elected and does not propose to maintain a final right to the seat?

If Mr. Manning, when this certificate was presented in this House, had produced it, and nothing else had appeared but what that disclosed, I for one should have voted to admit him. But the case took properly a different course. It was referred to a committee for an investigation of the facts. The House has done a similar thing often in other cases. If there is no exact precedent in point for it, it is high time that one was made. If it is true that officials high in authority, who are mere ministerial officers, will disregard official returns and give a certificate not based on the facts, in view of this rule of practice, the rule becomes mischievous and dangerous in its operation and ought to be departed from.

Now, in this case, under that resolution which required us to find whether Mr. Manning was entitled to a seat—I confine it now to him—I say he was not. The proof shows that the official returns elected Mr. Chalmers by over a thousand majority, and not Mr. Manning. The returns from the precincts and those of the county election commissioners to the secretary of state show that a majority of votes was cast for Mr. Chalmers. It is proved not only by the admission of Mr. Manning himself on record, but it is proved by the copies of the returns themselves and other papers referred to the committee. I have not heard a man on this floor argue that that mere clerical error on the so-called "tally-sheet," indorsed on the back of the certificate from Tate County, either nullified it or changed the fact certified to on the face of it, to wit, that James R. Chalmers had the 1,472 votes in question. There is not a fair-minded man on this floor who will risk his reputation as a lawyer or as an intelligent man by saying that certificate in its proper construction and taken as a whole was not strong and clear that Mr. Chalmers received those 1,472 votes. Nobody on this floor denies it. Nobody in this debate has got up or will get up and say it is not so. All virtually concede it, certainly for the purposes of the argument. Then you have a certificate which the governor gave, and which rested not on his own judgment, not on his own knowledge, but simply on the statement of the secretary of state, and that says what is not true.

Now, right there let me repeat that the certificate is but evidence. A certificate, though it have the seal of the State, does not itself constitute the title. It does not create a title, as it would do if the governor had the power of appointment. It is simply evidence. The "great seal" only authenticates it as genuine. The law requires the governor, without knowing anything about it, to issue the commission to the man whom the secretary of state found to be chosen in summing up the returns as made to him. And he did it. Therefore it is only proof of what he states, to wit, the secretary of state certifies that by the returns Mr. Manning is elected.

What do the official returns show? I will not dwell upon that question in detail, so much time having already been taken up with detail. But this fact is proved as clearly as anything can be proved under heaven. It is shown that the secretary of state falsified the returns. It has been truly said that in such cases false is fraudulent. If a man certifies to a fact when the papers lying open before his eyes show it was not so, his act is fraudulent. In this case the man certified to a fact when he knew it was not true, and no fair-minded man will claim it was true upon the inspection of the returns themselves. The returns of the county election commissioners left no possible doubt except as to Tate County, and no fair-minded man would have seen in the returns from that county anything more than a mere clerical error in a tally-sheet, which is no part of the return, and which is controlled by the certificate on which it is indorsed unnecessarily. Nobody can say that the secretary of state did his duty, but in all fairness must confess that he violated the same in making a false summing up of the returned votes.

With the fact then patent on the record, as already stated, that the secretary of state in his count falsified the return when his duty was simply to sum up the returns and ascertain who had the greater number of votes and declare him elected and certify that fact to the governor, who was thereupon required by law to issue the commission accordingly; with the further fact before us that the secretary of state falsified the return upon a mere pretext, without even the air of plausibility to excuse him, that there was no such man as Chambless who had run in that election, no such man in the district, and the secretary of state probably knew it—with these facts patent before us, what are we to conclude?

But what is more than that, and has more control still over my mind, is this fact: When the question came up, and before the secretary of state had acted, Mr. Chalmers petitioned one of the circuit court judges of Mississippi, a State court, and that court issued a mandatory injunction, which was duly served upon the secretary of state, forbidding him to count those 1,472 votes until it was decided by the court for whom they should be counted. That court was a court of competent jurisdiction and had the right to issue that restraining order. I say so in contradiction of what has been said on this floor in this discussion, because I have before me the decision of the supreme court of the State of Mississippi, in which it is distinctly and expressly so decided. As the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] has dealt with that decision in his speech, quoting from the same at some length, I will not put it into mine.

But he violated the injunction of the court, put the court at defiance, utterly disregarded its restraining order, and in the face and eyes of the returns and in contempt of the court proceeded to make the count. He did it on the same day that the restraining order was served upon him, rushed his conclusion into the office of the governor, and the governor immediately issued the commission. What next? A supplementary petition was put in by Mr. Chalmers stating these facts. The parties appeared, the hearing was had, the case was tried, and the same judge decided on the trial that inasmuch as this official had proceeded in violation of the mandatory injunction of the court and counted the 1,472 votes for one Chambless instead of Mr. Chalmers and in falsification of the return before him, it was not only wrong but his action was null and void, and the secretary of state was ordered to recount and give the result as it should have been given.

He declined to do it, and appealed the case to the supreme court of the State. It went to the supreme court, and what did that court say? It said in legal effect that it was within the power and jurisdiction of the circuit court to issue that mandatory injunction and the secretary of state was bound to heed it. But he did not do so; he violated the order, certified the result, the governor issued the commission, and the end in view was thus accomplished, and the case thus placed beyond the effective action of the court by way of remedy.

The court said that the governor having issued the commission, it could not order him to withdraw or to cancel it and issue another, for if the court did so decree it would do no good. The court, however, in effect say that if the matter had been heard by it before the secretary of state had certified the result of the count to the governor, so it could have acted before the governor had issued the commission, it would have compelled the counting of the votes returned from Tate County for Chalmers, and that would have given the certificate to Mr. Chalmers.

The courts say, as their conclusion, that they can not decree as asked because the governor had issued the commission and the question had passed beyond their proper authority; that their decree would then be in vain; that the remedy must be sought and had here where the governor's certificate would carry the matter for further adjudication. The court, however, made the secretary of state pay the costs of suit up to the time when the governor issued the commission, thereby recognizing the jurisdiction of the court in each instance.

Upon the facts as I have told them the supreme court was unable to annul the certificate, but we in the House of Representatives can do it in legal effect.

I say take that certificate and treat the same as if it were in fact destroyed or withdrawn by competent authority, for it is void and of no more effect than if it had been effectually canceled before it was presented here.

The decision of the court and jury in the hearing below was not questioned or reversed by the court of appeals save as to the efficiency of the proposed remedy, and as it accords with reason and justice may be regarded and have weight here.

Mr. Manning, an honorable man, as some of us know—for he served with us in this House in a prior Congress and was one term upon the Committee on Elections—knew the facts and what was the law; and what course did he take? He assumed and took that high position of honor and virtue which any just man would be likely to take. He said in effect, "I will not take the certificate, based, as it is, upon a clerical mistake in a tally-sheet. I admit that the ballots as cast and the official returns elected Mr. Chalmers, and he should have been declared elected. That little clerical mistake was of no consequence. He was entitled to the certificate and I will not claim a seat upon it." This is or was Mr. Manning's position. He put a full admission and a solemn declaration upon the record as a part of the pleadings in this contest, made so by law. The admission of Mr. Manning has been read very often in this debate. I will not read it again. Contestee did not accept the certificate and get his name enrolled as a member.

Now, will any gentleman of this House put himself in the position of one having a lower sense of justice and honor [A voice: "And decency!"] than Mr. Manning had, and do for him what he would not do for himself? A friend before me says "decency;" I will not use that word, because I am discussing this case solely in its legal aspects. I am not discussing a question of morals. This is a question of legal right; it is a question of fact. Mr. Manning continued to occupy that position up to a very recent date certainly, because when the first resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] it went over, and the other one was substituted with deliberation, that gentleman stating expressly on the floor of the House that this action was taken by the request of Mr. Manning. In accordance with this request of Mr. Manning himself, concurred in by gentlemen on the other side, the case was sent to the committee with an enlarged scope of inquiry and in a departure from the practice in ordinary cases.

The time for enforcing this usage as to prima facie evidence, as furnished by the certificate alone, was then passed and gone. The House submitted to the committee the wider, broader, and more comprehensive question: What is right and proper to be done under these circumstances and the state of facts disclosed? I have never heard from the lips of Mr. Manning that he is here of his own accord even now asking this House to do for him what he seemed (at least once) to scorn to do for himself. If he was going to wait and see if his right prima facie or his final right could be vindicated upon the proofs, it is apparent that nothing yet appears save what vindicates the propriety of his course in declining to ask for or take a seat on the strength of the certificate alone.

Now, I do not hesitate to say that on the facts before this House the certificate of the governor of Mississippi is perfectly void. It crumbles into dust. If I wanted any other authority from the other side on this point I would cite the remarks of my distinguished friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER], made when the case of Mr. MAYO was being dealt with. They will be referred to by another gentleman, and I refrain now from reading them. The certificate is void. Will you seat a man pending a contest upon evidence consisting of a certificate which is vitiated and the whole foundation of which is gone—a certificate given in violation of an injunction of a court of competent jurisdiction? The officer violating such an injunction defies the law; and no man should be allowed to take the fruits of such conduct in part or in whole. This House should never help out such a fraudulent proceeding by its own action.

It is said here that Mr. Manning can not admit away his right or the rights of his district or the public. This position, though in one sense true, is not so in another. He is the legally constituted agent of the public in this contest, made so by law. The public are not here by any memorial. If anybody is asking that he be seated, it is the minority of the district, who failed to elect him. Now, I undertake to say, as a matter of law, that the admissions made by Mr. Manning in his answer are conclusive. Where the law requires an admission or denial, and a man makes admissions in matters of fact alleged in the pleadings, the law expressly provides that of the thing thus alleged on the one side and admitted on the other no proof need be taken.

Mr. Chalmers has in proper form, in his notice of contest, alleged certain controlling facts. Mr. Manning in his answer thereto admits them in explicit, unambiguous, and absolute terms, except that he denies the allegation of fraud on the part of the secretary of state. The fact of the alleged clerical error in the tally-sheet indorsed on the return from Tate County and that by the official returns of the whole district Mr. Chalmers was elected are both distinctly admitted as alleged. The fact is admitted that the action of the secretary of state was in violation and in disregard of an injunction from the court, the issuing and service of which is admitted also.

Now, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COOK] in his impassioned speech undertook to quote a sentence from some report of mine—attempted in this way to make a personal point upon myself or to get some support for his contention. But the great difficulty with my friend is that he only quoted part of a paragraph and not all of a single sentence. The complete citation gives his contention no support and illustrates my point. In the case of Cook vs. Cutts, Mr. Cutts occupied the seat; there was a notice of contest and answer. The case was heard before the committee. A brief was put in on the part of Mr. Cutts. In that brief Mr. Cutts was claimed to have made a concession as to what the evidence proved in regard to eight votes in controversy. I did not find that the evidence before me established the alleged facts.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COOK]—and I pay my respects to him now—quoted this language:

It is not in the power of contestee to give away the rights of the public and allow another man to take the seat even by consent.

But he omitted to say that the concession was in the brief, and not in the pleadings; that it was a qualified concession in argument based on evidence before me, of which I could and was bound to judge as well as he. I quote the paragraph in full:

The majority report errs when it says contestee concedes seven illegal votes cast for him. He does not concede them only as proved by evidence more or less direct and satisfactory. He does not admit they should be deducted, but says, "If they should be," &c.

And then I add what Mr. COOK above quotes:

It is not in the power of contestee to give away the rights of the public and allow another man to take the seat, even by consent, to the detriment of the public and Treasury.

Mr. Cutts was the sitting member, and if unseated both parties would be entitled to the full salary, as it was near the end of the term. This makes the meaning of the sentence clear. The alleged concession was by way of argument, not of a fact; but as the expression of opinion as to the weight of evidence adduced. It does not require any great power of discrimination to see the distinctions between the two cases or classes of admissions.

An act of Congress provides:

In contested election cases the party contesting shall give notice in writing of his intention, and in such notice he shall specify the grounds upon which he relies in the contest.

Any member upon whom the notice mentioned in the preceding section may be served shall, within thirty days after the service thereof, answer such notice, admitting or denying the facts alleged therein, and stating specifically any other grounds upon which he rests the validity of his election; and shall serve a copy of his answer upon the contestant.—(Revised Statutes, section 106.)

A subsequent section of the act provides:

121. The testimony to be taken by either party to the contest shall be confined to the proof or disproof of the facts alleged or denied in the notice and answer mentioned in sections 105, 106.

The statute requires that the parties shall confine the evidence to the things in dispute, and take for granted the thing alleged and admitted. And yet gentlemen argue here that a man can not admit facts which shall conclude him, although done in pleadings. How are we going to the trial of the other cases before us and do justice upon any such doctrine as that? The contestants are made the parties to conduct the contest in their own behalf and in behalf of the public and as their agents. They can therefore conclude themselves and the public in the way contended for, and the law so contemplates. If we follow the theory of my friend from Iowa [Mr. COOK], when he says he would take the admissions in the pleadings if they looked reasonable and the evidence seemed to support them, it would lead to a strange result. The law requires no evidence, and there should be none to prove conceded facts as shown by the pleadings. Now, here in the pleadings is the admission of Mr. Manning, the contestee, clear and explicit, of facts which show that the returns elected Mr. Chalmers by over a thousand majority. He does not in his answer allege that he himself was elected or state any facts on which a claim can be based. He alleges general fraud in the use of money in the district, the use of Federal patronage, illegal action of deputy marshals, &c., which, if true, would at best only tend to vitiate the election of contestant and leave a vacancy. It would not elect him, because he does not attack any particular precinct or county or invalidate any particular returns which are specified, but he makes charges of fraud, &c., applicable only to the district generally.

I do not see the justice of the strictures which have been made upon the conduct of the committee because they looked at and examined all the papers referred to them. If in error, they erred in supposing that the resolution meant what it said, and that the House would not ask the committee to pass on a fact only which was patent and plain to every one without a reference. There was in truth and in fact no real question that the governor was the only official authorized to issue the commission to the person elected, or as to whether it was genuine, regular, and sufficient in form. Gentlemen talk about competency of evidence and fugitive papers. Why, sir, the inquiry into a prima facie case is ex parte anyway. And the inquiry needed only to go so far as to ascertain whether there were enough facts to discredit the certificate and render it unjust to allow contestee to be sworn in under the general rule referred to.

To go back now and divest the case of the facts disclosed, as is attempted under the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN], would be a singular course of proceeding. These facts can not be winked out of sight or obliterated from the minds of members in that way. The report finds every fact covered by that resolution, and a recommitment is wholly unnecessary. If the House wishes to confine its consideration to the credentials alone it can do so now without a recommitment. As for myself, I should have been willing to seat Mr. Chalmers, because he ought to be treated as having the credentials, having been deprived of them by fraud on the part of the secretary of state, and only prevented from having them by that official defeating the court in its attempt to secure them to him. The returns to the secretary of state elected him, and the rest followed as a matter of law. But the committee did not care to go so far as this. English precedents might perhaps have justified a different recommendation.

I read from the Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, by Mr. Cushing, section 144:

This distinction between elections and returns has led in England to their being in some instances separately considered in the same case; so that where it appears, without going into the merits of an election, that the petitioner against a sitting member was apparently elected and ought to have been returned, the House of Commons will reverse the position of the parties by excluding the sitting member and putting the petitioner in his place as duly returned, leaving the election open to be controverted and throwing the burden of doing so upon the party to whom it properly belongs.

The only question which the House has to decide now is whether contestee shall be seated pending the contest on its merits. The rights of Mr. Chalmers may well be left till a decision is had on the merits.

I have said perhaps all that need be said. It will be seen that the proofs stated, when taken in their mildest import, show that the certificate of the governor relied upon is the result of a clerical mistake on the part of a scrivener in writing Mr. Chalmers's name Chambless in an unimportant and non-essential tally-sheet, so called, indorsed on the back of an otherwise regular and sufficient certificate of the election commissioners of Tate County. Beyond this is the fact that the secretary of state committed a gross error in counting the 1,472 votes so returned as if cast for J. R. Chambless instead of James R. Chalmers. It was a plain violation of duty and the manifest act of a strong partisan, who resorted to a poor pretext as an excuse. Added to this is the fact that in so doing he utterly disregarded and openly defied the arm of the law which was extended to arrest his threatened action and compel him to await a legal decision in the premises. That his conduct was fraudulent, governed by partisan motives rather than by convictions of duty, is placed beyond the realm of controversy on the proofs before us. It was a deliberate and a persistent attempt to defeat the sovereign will of the people as expressed at the ballot-box by the falsification of the result of returns which it was his official duty to give full effect to and certify the same correctly to the governor. He committed a great political crime nearly akin to treason. It was probably done in view of the existing rule of practice in this House, which is now being invoked on the other side.

He who by fraud, or by willful disregard of his sworn duty, defeats the will of the people as expressed by their votes, commits a political crime next to treason and nearly akin to it. (Lyons, J., 36 Wisconsin, 506.)

The question is whether the House will give Mr. Manning the benefits of such action and help on the fraud to its fruition in the present change of purpose on his part to claim a seat on the strength of the certificate, which said claim he renounced at the outset. It may be that the governor was not cognizant of the facts when he awarded the commission. But whether he was or not, its foundation has given way, and that which was the direct product of the fraud, and which rests solely on it by its very terms, must fall with it.

In finding the action of the secretary of state to be null and void we only follow an adjudication by a court of contestee's own State, based on the same facts and founded in good sense and sound reason.

If there is any usage in this House which requires it to help out and give effect to such a fraud as has been perpetrated, it is high time that the same was abolished. But, as already shown, that is not necessary.

I send now to the desk an amendment which I shall offer when the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania comes up for action, after which I will yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the resolution for recommitment proposed by Mr. CURTIN, of Pennsylvania, as follows, namely:

"The committee is also instructed to find and report whether Mr. Manning alleges and sets up in his answer any claim that he was himself chosen, and whether there is any proof independent of the certificate of the governor whereby he seeks and proposes to maintain such a claim in the pending contest on the merits."

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

During the remarks of Mr. RANNEY,

Mr. SNYDER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 160) making further appropriations for the relief of destitute persons in the districts overflowed by the Ohio River and its tributaries.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—CHALMERS VS. MANNING.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair). The gentleman from Iowa will be recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, it is hardly necessary for me to speak on this question after the closing remarks that have been made by my friend from Massachusetts. It is a matter of entire indifference to this side of the House as to which of the two gentlemen claiming the seat shall be sworn in, for the present or in the future, and occupy the position. Politically both are opposed to this side of the House. The only question that can concern us, therefore, is what is the precedent that ought to be established in this case; and to my mind the simple statement of the case must settle it in all minds that are prepared and seek justice and not to conclude upon technicalities.

An election was held on the 7th of November, at which all the signed certificates by the legal officers presiding in the counties over the election certified that Mr. Chalmers had about one thousand majority, and was therefore elected. On the 11th of November those returns, so far as now under dispute, were received at the office of the secretary of state. On the 18th of November, looking on the back of one of the papers, he found the name of a man who is not known to have been a candidate; who is not known to have lived in Mississippi; who is not known to be in the United States of America. He recognizes that unsigned memorandum, and himself declares the other candidate, Mr. Manning, to have the majority of votes.

These facts are now before the House. They are not disputed. Mr. Chalmers has received at least a thousand more votes than Mr. Manning. The papers are here that show it. We directed the committee to find, not who should be seated on the governor's certificate, but who should be seated on the papers in possession of the committee which were referred to them. They report these facts.

Now, shall we who stand impartial between the two candidates go against all the record in the case and say that the man who received a thousand fewer votes than the other should be placed here upon our floor? Had it been submitted to the Clerk we should have answered yes, upon the governor's certificate and nothing else. But having, by order of the House itself, finally referred to a committee to ascertain upon that and other papers who had the prima facie right, we find that determined by the very papers upon which alone the governor's certificate can issue and to be determined in favor of Mr. Chalmers. I may like him or I may dislike him. The one fact patent to us is that he had a thousand more votes, and if any man is entitled to a seat it is he.

The only question is, whether this committee shall say that they wish further time to go into all the merits of the case. They ask that. We must give it to them if they demand it, I suppose. But upon the returns signed by the returning officers and sent to the office of the secretary of state Mr. Chalmers ought to march up before that desk, lift his hand, and take the oath as prima facie entitled to the seat, that prima facie case being determined by the very figures submitted to us in a report of a committee of this House. It is an injustice to the people of his district to keep him out. It is no injustice to keep Mr. Manning out, because Mr. Manning was not chosen, and we know he was not chosen at that election.

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had adopted a resolution, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, authorizing the Public Printer to print and bind 24,000 additional copies of the Tariff Compilation for 1884 (Senate Report No. 12, Forty-eighth Congress, first session); 8,000 for the use of the Senate and 16,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 253) for the relief of John Leathers;

Joint resolution (S. R. 42) authorizing certain officers of the Navy to accept presents from foreign powers; and Joint resolution (S. R. 51) authorizing an expenditure of money for Indian educational purposes.

CONTESTED ELECTION—CHALMERS VS. MANNING.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I take the floor for the purpose of concluding the debate according to the understanding announced this morning. Before appropriating to myself any part of the time, according to agreement with the gentleman who represents the minority of the committee [Mr. COOK], I yield to him for his control one-half of the hour.

Mr. KASSON. Has the previous question been seconded?

The SPEAKER. The previous question has not yet been demanded.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I will at the end of the hour demand the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. You must demand it now.

The SPEAKER. There is some question as to whether or not under the rules of the House the hour can be taken for closing the debate after the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. In order to avoid any embarrassment that might arise on the question whether the hour for debate would remain after the previous question is ordered, I desire, with the leave of the House, to take the floor now and occupy the hour now, and at its expiration demand the previous question, which would of course shut off debate.

Mr. KASSON. I would like, as a parliamentary question, to inquire whether it is not the settled practice that the member reporting from a committee is entitled to an hour after the previous question is ordered?

The SPEAKER. Under the former rules of the House it was well settled that the hour for closing debate could be occupied as well after as before the previous question was ordered; and indeed it was the practice to occupy it after the ordering of the previous question. But under the new rules the question is presented, which so far the present incumbent of the chair has not decided, whether the hour can be taken after the previous question is ordered, unless it is so understood at the time when it is ordered.

Mr. KASSON. While I do not wish to press the present occupant of the chair to a premature decision, I wish to say it is very desirable that we should understand what actually are our rights under these rules.

The SPEAKER. The present occupant of the chair is inclined to think the hour can be occupied after as before the previous question is ordered. But the Chair has not yet been called to render a decision upon that question.

Mr. CALKINS. Under the indication given by the Chair I think it very desirable we should know just what is the effect of ordering the previous question as regards the time allowed for debate. But meanwhile I hope unanimous consent will be given to have the previous question ordered now, and then let the hour be taken for debate.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. In reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana, I feel it due to other gentlemen who have spoken to me on the subject to state that some gentlemen desire to offer an amendment proposing the resolution of the minority of the committee as a substitute for that of the majority. And I would not like to have that cut off.

Mr. CALKINS. Let that be done now.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. If that can be considered as pending by unanimous consent, I have no objection to the previous question being ordered now.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the resolutions reported by the minority will be considered as pending as a substitute for the resolution reported by the majority of the committee. If there be no objection, also, the previous question will be now ordered, with the understanding that the debate shall be permitted to go on for one hour.

Mr. CURTIN. I desire, if this is the proper stage in the consideration of this grave question by the House, to ask to withdraw the resolution which I offered at the inception of the debate on this question. I am the author of the resolution; I offered it to the House; and I now ask to withdraw it. In asking that I desire to give my reasons for it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] asks leave to withdraw his resolution and to state his reasons therefor. Is there objection?

Mr. COOK. Is the resolution to be withdrawn now?

Mr. CURTIN. Whenever it is parliamentary to do so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks now is the proper time to withdraw it, for otherwise it would be before the House and included under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. TALBOTT. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] withdraws his resolution, would it be in order to renew it?

The SPEAKER. Not after the previous question is ordered. The Chair asked unanimous consent that the previous question be now considered as ordered, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] asked leave to withdraw his resolution.

Mr. COOK. It seems to me that it would be as well to consume the hour now and consider the previous question as ordered at the end of that time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asked for unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as now ordered, and no objection was made. But before the Chair announced that fact to the House the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] rose to withdraw his resolution.

Mr. CURTIN. I offered that resolution in good faith, desiring that the minds of this House should be settled as to the rights of the parties contesting a seat on this floor, and more especially the right of the gentleman who presented legal, regular, and proper credentials, under which he had a right to the seat if he had approached that desk and asked that the oath required should be administered to him.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I submit to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. CURTIN. I have the floor, and, as is usual with me, I intend to maintain it until the Speaker takes me from it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER], as the Chair understands, makes the point of order that debate is not now in order.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Yes, sir.

Mr. CURTIN. I am only giving my reasons for offering the resolution.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I am as willing to show all the courtesy to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that any gentleman would desire to have shown him. But I raised the question whether within the last hour of this debate that gentleman can take me off the floor to debate a proposition of his own. I submit to him whether it is fair to the House or to me.

Mr. CURTIN. It comes out of the time of the gentleman who represents the minority.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Then I will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that of the last hour accorded for the conclusion of this debate I have agreed to yield to the gentleman to whom my friend refers one-half of it, and I presume he will in his time yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania as much time as he desires.

Mr. CURTIN. Then I will take five minutes of the time now.

Mr. KASSON. What is the position of the question?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to ordering the previous question at this time? It has been suggested that by unanimous consent the previous question shall be considered as now ordered, with the understanding that there shall be an hour for the conclusion of the debate. The Chair had submitted that request to the House and asked for objection, and none had been heard. But the Chair had not announced that fact to the House, and thereupon the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] rose, stating that he did so for the purpose of withdrawing his resolution, and the Chair recognized him for that purpose.

Mr. KASSON. Is the previous question now ordered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again ask, not having announced before, if there is objection to the request that the previous question be considered as now ordered, with the understanding that there shall be an hour allowed for the closing of the debate, to be divided equally between the advocates and the opponents of the report of the Committee on Elections? That the Chair understands to be the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COOK], representing the minority of the committee, thirty minutes of the time allowed by the order of the House.

Mr. CURTIN. The debate on this question has settled one thing, if that can not be determined from the report of the committee, and that is that General Manning has a legal certificate, under which he could have been sworn in as a sitting member from the second Congressional district of Mississippi had he presented it. That is crystallized in the debate, and the legal minds of this House seem settled on that question.

The debate has run into a discussion of the facts which it was the pleasure of the Committee on Elections to receive and to some extent consider. All the learned gentlemen who have spoken on this question in opposition to seating Mr. Manning have predicated their conclusions and their logic, so far as applicable, upon the facts in this case.

Now, when the facts come before this House I shall be prepared to deal with them, as I trust the gentleman from Massachusetts who last addressed the House [Mr. RANNEY] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COOK] would, if the case is properly presented to them. I do not propose, however, that the certificate of the governor of a sovereign State under its great seal shall be disregarded upon uncertain testimony before a committee of this House.

I yield to no such sentiment. The right of representation is guaranteed by the Constitution, the paramount law of this land. The sovereignty of a State, the declaration of the executive of the State, with its broad seal, must be regarded until proved fraudulent or void. If General Manning, at the beginning of this session, had presented himself at the bar of this House with the certificate from the governor of his State he would have been sworn, and General Chalmers could have contested his seat and proved, if able to do so, that he received more votes than General Manning; for the man to seat on the facts is the one who received the most legal votes.

But gentlemen defend their exclusion of General Manning on the ground that he has waived his right. My friends, do not be deluded by questions which are irrevelant to the issue contained in the papers now before the House—an issue which goes down to the very fundamental principles of this Government—the right of representation of a sovereign State, which is challenged to the front in vindication of this man. Gentlemen say that General Manning declared he would leave his case to the House, that the House should decide it; and on the declaration of General Manning it is said we should exclude him from the seat and deprive the people of the second district of Mississippi of the right of representation to which they are entitled under the Constitution.

Now, Mr. Speaker, representing General Manning, with his full consent and approbation, speaking for him, I bring him to the Clerk's desk and ask that the oath be administered to him on the certificate of the Governor of Mississippi.

Mr. CALKINS. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. CURTIN (advancing to the Clerk's desk in company with Mr. Manning). I present Van H. Manning to be sworn in as a member of this House upon the certificate of the governor of Mississippi, attested by the broad seal of that great and loyal State.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] rises to make a point of order. He will state it.

Mr. CALKINS. I make the point that this House has already taken jurisdiction of this question and has referred it to the Committee on Elections, which has made a report upon it, and the question is now under consideration by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it unnecessary to decide any question of order in this matter, because the question whether or not Mr. Manning is entitled to take the oath of office is the very question which the House is now considering and upon which it is about to vote. Of course the Chair would not undertake to administer the oath of office to any person claiming to be a member-elect while the House is considering his right to the seat. [Applause.]

Mr. BELFORD. Now ring down the curtain; the play is over. [Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Speaker, what is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] having been withdrawn, the first vote will be upon agreeing to the resolution reported by the minority of the committee, which declares in substance that Mr. Manning is entitled to the seat and should be sworn in.

Mr. CURTIN. That is my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. In accordance with my announcement a while ago I yield one-half of my hour to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COOK].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COOK] will control the first thirty minutes of the hour.

Mr. COOK. It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to occupy the thirty minutes that the gentleman from Georgia has kindly yielded to me. I desire to yield twenty minutes at the close to my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

The SPEAKER. There are twenty-five minutes of the gentleman's half hour remaining.

Mr. COOK. I did not know I had occupied five.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, this debate has lasted for three days. When the case was first presented, and especially when the duty was assigned to me of submitting the views of those who agreed with me, I hoped that we might discuss fairly the question of law involved, and then decide it accordingly.

I have nothing more to say except in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY], who in his remarks has referred to me. He made, as he always does, a good argument, but he based it upon a false assumption of fact. He says that Mr. Manning admits he was not elected. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that that is not true.

Mr. RANNEY. The gentleman does not mean to misrepresent me. I say on the returns he does not admit he was elected.

Mr. COOK. I do not so understand him.

Mr. PETTIBONE. You do now.

Mr. COOK. Mr. Manning expressly asserts that he was elected.

Mr. PETTIBONE. But produces no proof.

Mr. COOK. But he insists that over 2,000 of the votes cast for Mr. Chalmers were obtained by fraudulent means. With that I am done. Hence it is not true that Mr. Manning has never claimed his seat.

Mr. RANNEY. The gentleman does not mean to misrepresent me. I did not say Mr. Manning did not claim there were fraudulent votes cast.

Mr. COOK. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. RANNEY. I say that the returns showed that Mr. Chalmers was elected, while he denied the charge of fraud.

Mr. COOK. Who denied the charge of fraud?

Mr. RANNEY. In the answer to Mr. Manning.

Mr. COOK. I believe this is my time, and there is so very little of it left that I must be excused for declining to yield any further portion of it.

Now, Mr. Manning in his answer admits, if you choose to so claim it, that the majority of the votes in the boxes were against him, but he expressly asserts that 2,000 or more of those votes were procured by fraudulent means, which he specifies in his answer. I insist then, if that be true, that Manning and not Chalmers was elected.

Mr. RANNEY. The gentleman will not misrepresent me, I am sure. He said there was fraud in the district generally, without specifying any at any particular place.

Mr. COOK. I am not charging anything on the gentleman from Massachusetts, but only call attention to what Mr. Manning says in his answer.

I yield now the remaining portion of my time to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I beg the indulgence of the House and apologize for desiring to occupy any part of its time at this late hour of the day. I am a Mississippian. Fifteen years ago I emigrated to Arkansas, and became a resident of the district which I now have the honor to represent upon this floor. It is a district composed largely of Mississippians coming from the district in Mississippi out of which this contest grows. I am persuaded that a large majority of the most intelligent of that class of people in my district believe the action of the secretary of state of Mississippi to have been a shameless trick and a bald fraud. But I am bound under my convictions of the law governing this case to cast my vote, upon the issue now presented, apparently against that theory of it. Hence I feel that it is due myself that I spread upon the record now as a perpetual memorial of my reasons for casting that vote the authorities by which I am controlled.

I am induced to spread these reasons upon the record by the additional fact that prominent Democrats, honorable, conscientious, upright men, differ on this question. Mr. Speaker, if to youth must be charged errors and follies, age ought to bring discretion and accountability, if not wisdom; and when gentlemen who have grown gray in the law, like the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] and my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] on this side of the House, before a body in the main composed of lawyers, indulge in perversions of that law which are absolutely monstrous, somebody ought to be found with the courage to expose them.

Now, sir, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] on yesterday used this language:

And right here, Mr. Speaker, let me suggest to you that no man can have a right prima facie or otherwise to a seat in this House simply upon the fact that he holds a certificate.

And the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] reasserted the principle to-day, and added "the books are full of this doctrine."

Sir, that is the language of a class of lawyers before justices of the peace. It is always easy to make citations of authorities in that way. But those gentlemen who assert this proposition produce no authority, not a case, not a citation from a text-book, nothing, absolutely nothing, for our consideration.

Now, sir, in the face of the authorities I cite, they must pardon me if I modestly dissent from their view of the law. In citing these authorities I want to remind the House that they both held and gravely argued that a certificate in due form, executed by the proper authority, at most, only entitled the holder to a seat by courtesy. Courtesy? Let us see.

McCrary, in his American Law of Elections, says:

SEC. 208. It is enough for a prima facie case if the certificate comes from the proper officer of the State, and clearly shows that the person claiming under it has been adjudged to be duly elected by the officer or board on whom the law of the State has imposed the duty of ascertaining and declaring the result. And see Kerr vs. Trego (47 Pennsylvania State Reports, 292), where it is held that the certificate of election sanctioned by law or usage is prima facie evidence of title to the office, and can only be set aside by a contest in the form prescribed by law.

Now, sir, what does this authority assert? Is it that the certificate gives a seat by "courtesy" to its holder? The language of the law is that it constitutes "prima facie evidence of title." If I hold prima facie evidence of title to my homestead does it guarantee me no right? Is it a bare, naked courtesy that I enjoy? And yet that is the argument of these gentlemen, who come here gray in the law and talk to us with a zeal worthy of its majesty.

But let me read a little further from McCrary on Elections:

SEC. 209. When the statute gives the governor of a State the power, and makes it his duty, to commission the person elected to an office, the issuing of a commission by him confers a vested right upon the person commissioned, which nothing but a judicial decision can take away or authorize the governor to recall.

Is a "vested right" a mere "courtesy?"

Let me read a little further. I do not wonder the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] would not suffer this authority to be read. It takes a bold man to assert on this floor the monstrous propositions he undertook to maintain to-day.

SEC. 216. It is to be observed in this connection that, while in determining the prima facie right to a seat, the House of Representatives will not look behind the certificate, if it be signed by the proper officers, and if it contains a statement in unequivocal terms of the result of the election; yet something may appear upon the face of the certificate itself to destroy or impair its value as prima facie evidence.

And again, as if to preclude all doubt, he says:

SEC. 221. There can be no doubt but that a certificate of election regular in form and signed by the proper authority constitutes prima facie evidence of title to the office, which can only be set aside by such proceedings for contesting the election as the law provides.—(Commonwealth vs. Baxter, 35 Pennsylvania State Reports.

The certificate, whether rightfully or wrongfully given, confers upon the person holding it the prima facie right—not courtesy—to the office.—(People vs. Miller, 16 Michigan, 56; Crowell vs. Lambert, 10 Minnesota, 369; State vs. Sherwood, 15 Minnesota, 221; State vs. Churchill, ibid., 455.)

Can language be plainer than this? Well, perhaps, Mr. Speaker, it can. Let us read on the following page of this treatise:

SEC. 223. The certificate, therefore, must be regarded as evidence of the election of the person named therein so far conclusive that it can not be attacked except in the ordinary mode provided for contesting, but it is not evidence of the qualifications of the person named.

That is, it is not evidence that he is of the required age or possesses the other prerequisite qualifications to hold the office; but it is evidence of the election nevertheless.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my friend from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY], who has been a judge in that State I understand for many years, gave us an extraordinary speech yesterday. His friends thought it unanswerable. From the standpoint of the merits, and as touching the action of the secretary of state of the State of Mississippi relating to the returns of Tate County, it was not without its force and high moral sentiment.

We all admired his strong physique; his clear, rich voice; his classical language, and handsome delivery. He has withheld that speech for revision. It ought to be revised; not in the particulars I have mentioned, but it should be purged of the misapplications of the law with which it was so pregnant. It was remarkable in another respect. Beginning with the modesty of the shrinking, blushing school-girl, he grew in five minutes to the full-grown school-master, lecturing many members on this floor his equal in age and experience.

I can not recall his language now; but I recollect of his referring to opinions of gentlemen—formed without investigation—and said, while the court had been investigating the law in the House (alluding to the majority of the committee to which he belonged), these gentlemen had been discussing it on the horse-blocks, or some such expression as that. These gentlemen, he said, had challenged precedents for the majority report of the Committee on Elections. Mr. Speaker, I undertake to assert this proposition—not that there is no precedent to be found for that report; far from it. The supreme court of Arkansas decided (and I stop to say in justice to that court and the State that it was a reconstruction court) that a flat-boat chained to a tree in the Mississippi River was real estate; and if the supreme court of a great sovereign State has made such a decision as that, even gentlemen of my brief experience at the bar ought to be careful how they assert that no precedent can be found for any case, however monstrous or absurd it may be.

But what I do assert is that no well-considered or approved case upholding the majority report has been cited during this three days' debate; and I assert further, that in my opinion only two cases have been cited, and no text-writer whatever, who squints in that direction.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Let me call the gentleman's attention to section 225 of the same book, when the certificate may in effect destroy itself.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. My friend will excuse me; I heard him on yesterday—heard his whole argument, and did not interrupt him.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I want to show the gentleman while he is making quotations one that bears upon this case.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I can not yield to the gentleman; my time will not admit of interruptions. But, sir, in response I tell the gentleman the case he refers to is where the certificate on its face impeaches itself; nobody denies that; nobody on either side has said General Manning's certificate was not regular on its face or that it impeached itself. The whole Committee on Elections, including the gentleman himself, agrees that the certificate is regular on its face.

I again reassert that but two cases have been cited as precedents to support the action of the majority of the Committee on Elections. The first is the New Jersey case, which is in point. But Judge McCrary says of that case:

This precedent has never since been followed in a single instance. It is so clearly wrong, and as a precedent so exceedingly dangerous, that the House has not hesitated to disregard it entirely on every occasion when the question has arisen.

No man has seriously invoked that case as authority in this debate, though it has been mentioned. The other case is the Colorado case, Hunt vs. Chilcott. My friend from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] alluded to that case, cited it as an exception to the general rule for which I am contending. He went further, and admitted that the current of authority was strong against him. I sympathized with his manly frankness in this, so characteristic of the long-suffering race from which he springs; but I could not admire his discretion when he found it necessary, in order to maintain his position, to attack the only standard text-books in this country and an almost unbroken line of well-considered precedents in this body for years.

But I return to the case of Hunt vs. Chilcott, known as the Colorado case, and reported in 2 Bartlett, page 164, which is before me now. That is an extraordinary case. It has its history. I will not give it now. I have another object in view. My friend from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] did not deal fairly with the House in that case. No man in citing an authority to a court from a text-book ought to omit the author's construction or criticism of it. That is what he did. It is what lawyers call garbling the law. That is a harsh term, and I will not use it. It was, I know, an omission not intended, but the result is the same.

Let us examine that case. It was decided by this body in 1866, not a time when the country could expect a fair judicial consideration by this body of any political question. Even then this case did not receive the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Elections. It is a significant fact that the minority report was signed by M. C. Kerr, of Indiana, one of your distinguished and honorable predecessors, Mr. Speaker, and John A. Nicholson, of Delaware, and the venerable LUKE P. POLAND, who now occupies a seat upon the other side of this Chamber. Sir, the majority report in that case does not controvert the law for which we contend, namely, "that the holder of a certificate regular on its face is prima facie entitled to the seat." The majority of that committee reported that Hunt, who held the certificate, did not rest his case on the certificate alone, as Mr. Manning does in this case. They said, not content with the certificate, Hunt had introduced the governor of Colorado, and proven facts that showed the certificate was issued in violation of law. I quote the language. Say the committee:

The certificate of the governor thus appears to have been issued in violation of the laws of the Territory, in order to reverse the facts of the canvass.

There the committee, on a prima facie case, did go behind the certificate. Why? Because Hunt, who held it, as they say, proved it was issued in violation of law. Mr. Manning has done no such foolish thing as that. He rested before the committee solely on his certificate. But there is another significant fact about this case. The members who signed the minority report assert that the statement to the effect that Hunt did not rely upon the certificate alone was untrue.

I use their language:

Now, the undersigned have read the above statement with great surprise, because in the facts that transpired before the committee they know of no foundation for it whatever. On the contrary, Governor Cummings expressly declined to make any statements in the nature of evidence, and only appeared before the committee in the proper capacity of attorney for Mr. Hunt, and addressed his argument to the case made by the credentials and record evidence alone. He refused when requested to detail the facts in connection with the dispute about the right to the seat.

Indeed, the committee could not with propriety, under the resolution of reference, receive or consider any parol evidence whatever, and did not attempt to do so. We therefore ask the House to adopt the following resolution as a substitute for that of the majority:

"Resolved, That A. C. Hunt, esq., is prima facie entitled to the seat in this House as a Delegate from the Territory of Colorado pending the contest of his right to the same by George M. Chilcott, esq."

These were exciting times. They were uncertain times. The brute force of a great revolution had scarcely yielded to the supremacy of law and order. No great respect can be given to a case like this, even if directly in point and the facts undisputed. But it is not in point, because Van Manning, before the committee, rested solely on his certificate. The majority report in the Hunt case says that Hunt did not, but proved himself out of court by the governor who issued him the certificate.

Therein lies the difference. No man can fail to see that it is no precedent for this case, nor is it authority for the House to go behind the certificate on the prima facie case, unless Mr. Manning had offered evidence in addition to the certificate, which he did not do. It will not do for Mr. Chalmers to offer the evidence or for the committee to procure it of their own accord, for that is going into the merits. It must come from the holder of the certificate. He must discredit it under that case. Judge McCrary, in construing that case, says:

While, therefore, it was conceded that the House should not insist upon looking beyond the certificate in determining a prima facie case, it was held that if the party holding the certificate saw fit to offer evidence in addition to the certificate the House might take notice of it.

Mr. Speaker, when the question now before the House comes to a vote I do not pretend to know what the venerable and distinguished gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] will do; but I venture the belief that the man who, amid the clamor and passions of his own party in 1874, had the courage to rise up in this great body and do justice to brave and honorable men, struggling for the constitutional right of controlling their own domestic affairs, even though political opponents, will not in 1884 repudiate the report I have read from in Hunt vs. Chilcott, signed by him nearly twenty years ago, and which has been recognized as sound law ever since that report was erroneously and unceremoniously disregarded by this body. I wish he would rise now and give the House the unwritten history of that case.

I mention in passing that the Texas case, already cited by several members during this debate, decided when the minority now was in the majority on this floor, directly overruled Hunt vs. Chilcott, and has been the recognized rule ever since.

I know that my time will not permit me to go into this question as fully as I should like to go. But I want to invite the attention of my friend from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] to the mistake into which he fell upon yesterday—and an egregious blunder it was. He read, Mr. Speaker, from sections 169, 170, 171, and 172 of Cushing's Parlimentary Law and Practice. But if he had turned back to the beginning of the chapter from which he read he would have found that the sections he read were upon the merits of the case, and not upon the prima facie right to a seat pending a trial on the merits. I will read the two first sections of the chapter:

SEC. 142. Though, as we have just seen, persons returned are presumed to be duly elected, at least so far as to entitle them to assume the functions of members; yet the decisions of the returning officers are not conclusive. Their proceedings may be revised and their judgments corrected, and the members returned by them may be excluded and others admitted upon due investigation by the competent authority.

SEC. 143. It will be perceived from what has been stated with regard to the determination and authenticating of elections, that one person may be in fact elected while another is apparently elected, in which case the latter is entitled to be returned, though the former is entitled to the seat: as for example, where two candidates only are voted for, and by the decision of the returning officers, admitting illegal or rejecting legal votes, one of the candidates has an apparent majority. The latter is entitled to the return, but the other "is clearly entitled to the seat."

But, Mr. Speaker, both what he read and what I have now read from this author is an exposition of English law, now greatly modified in this country. If he had desired to see what that author had to say about American parliamentary law, he should have turned over to section 240, where the whole doctrine for which we contend is summed up in a few sentences. It reads as follows:

The principles of parliamentary law applicable to the questions are perfectly simple and plain, founded in the very nature of things, established by the uniform practice and authority of Parliament, and confirmed by reason and analogy. These principles are as follows: First, that every person duly returned is a member, whether legally elected or not, until his election is set aside; second, that no person who is not duly returned is a member, even though legally elected, until his election is established; third, that conflicting claimants, both in form legally returned, are neither of them entitled to be considered as members until the question between them has been settled; and fourth, that those members who are duly returned, and they alone (the members whose rights are to be determined being excluded), constitute a judicial tribunal for the decision of all questions of this nature.

Those are the four fundamental, elementary principles recognized by the standard authors, so far as I know, on this subject as governing the organization of a parliamentary body; and yet gentlemen, learned gentlemen, come and tell us that the books are full of precedents in the face of these authorities, and yet offer none whatever for our consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I have no sort of idea of changing a single vote by what I have said. My time is rapidly expiring. I desire to yield a moment to my friend from Kentucky before me [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not wish to occupy the gentleman's time.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. So long as gentlemen on this floor will make such speeches as we heard yesterday from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADAMS], we can never expect to get anything like a judicial hearing upon a case of this sort from them. Gentlemen forget the elementary principles, and suffer their judgments to be warped by party prejudice, and in the very face of the law run blindly over the established rules that ought to govern us in our action upon this floor. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Four minutes.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. There is one other proposition which has been discussed so fully that I do not know that I can add anything to it. It is the question of the power of Mr. Manning to discredit the certificate which he presents here. I deny in all the length and breadth and height and depth the proposition that he can do any such thing. Sir, reason tells us that the law confides no such power to him. This is a question in which there are three parties to the controversy: the two contestants for the seat and 150,000 people in the second district of Mississippi; and upon this point I repeat the language of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, spoken at the other end of the Capitol, the senior Senator from that State, in the Kellogg and Spofford case, which was referred to incidentally by Governor DORSHEIMER in his terse, forcible argument the other day. Senator Garland said:

Suppose the sitting Senator, Mr. KELLOGG, had failed to make any response or to take any notice of the application on the part of Mr. Spofford. If it is strictly and in every sense a legal proceeding the Senate could have defaulted KELLOGG, rendered a judgment by default, and seated Spofford. That no man will contend could be done, because whether he appears to defend or not the Senate's duty is, under the Constitution, to ascertain who was elected. Further, suppose KELLOGG and Spofford had agreed and filed a written stipulation, as in courts of justice, that a judgment should be rendered in favor of Spofford against KELLOGG, the Senate could not have rendered the judgment. You can not default an American constituency in that way. You can not stipulate the rights of an American constituency away in any tribunal. Suppose the Senate, progressing in this inquiry, finds that neither was elected, which it might do very well, and should award the seat to some man in Louisiana who got only one vote, if there was such a one. Those statements illustrate the futility of attempting to assimilate this throughout to a proceeding in court.

To appropriate his idea, if you undertake to liken this case to a case in court the analogy limps at every step. Yet that is what is contended for. But if that position was correct, still the case now stands like a case on demurrer. It stands just this way: Manning says to the court, "I hold the certificate, and on this I demand judgment for the seat prima facie." Chalmers responds, "True, you have the certificate, and it is regular; but you should not have judgment." The court says, "Why not?" "Because," says Chalmers, "he admitted in another case that the certificate stated a falsehood." "But," says the court on demurrer, "I am confined to the face of the certificate. I can not look to the merits now." That is precisely the case before us, if it is to be likened to a case in court.

But, Mr. Speaker, the difficulty here is to get gentlemen to separate the law from unofficial facts not before the House. I have known lawyers who never could discuss a case on demurrer without giving a history of all the facts they expected to prove, the biography of their clients, and the character of the witnesses they expect to introduce. That is precisely what we have witnessed throughout this debate. It is an imperfection of human nature, hard to be overcome. It is, however, not an imperfection strongly to be condemned, because I believe it is most largely developed in the untrained but honest mind. It is only to be condemned because it ignores a rule indispensable in the administration of the law. But this House is largely composed of lawyers. They ought not to ignore the law. They can not do so ignorantly. If it is to be done, it is because prejudice clouds reason, and party feeling is stronger than law.

It is admitted by some that Manning can not default Chalmers into a seat in this House, but they assert that he can discredit his certificate in such way as to deprive himself of a right to the seat in Congress which the certificate otherwise gave him. How is that? Is the rule of law that a certificate is prima facie evidence of a right to a seat made exclusively for the holder of the certificate? That will not do. McCrary gives three reasons for this rule:

SEC. 204. First, the interests of the people might suffer for want of the services of a public officer without it.

Second. Serious injustice might result to the holder of the credentials if any other rule was adopted.

Third. The organization of a legislative body might be prevented without it.

These reasons can not be separated. All will admit that the right of a State to representation in Congress is fundamental in law and overshadows in importance all other reasons that can be assigned for the basis of this rule. If you say, then, that Mr. Manning can discredit by an admission the certificate which entitled him to a seat, you admit that he has it in his power in that way to defeat for months at least the right of representation of the second district of Mississippi on this floor.

You affirm that he can destroy a rule of law made a hundred-fold more for the benefit of 150,000 people in the second district of Mississippi than for himself, without any misconduct, fault, or neglect of theirs. I deny it. It is absurd and monstrous. No well-considered authority has been cited or can be for that proposition.

But the fact is there were no issues before the Committee on Elections in this case except as to which of the two, Manning or Chalmers, upon the face of their respective papers, was entitled to a seat prima facie pending the trial on the merits. To avoid this conclusion the committee took damaging admissions of Manning made a year ago, made in an answer in a case in court in the State of Mississippi and used them to discredit a certificate upon which he alone relied before the committee, and which they were compelled to admit was regular and issued by the proper authority. I submit they could not know of these statements until they had violated the law and disregarded the resolution under which they were acting.

They went behind the certificate, which alone constitutes the prima facie case, when they found these statements. Having violated the law to find them, they violated it again in using them, and then refused to do the only thing the resolution under which they were acting directed, namely, to find whether Manning or Chalmers is entitled to be sworn in pending the contest on the merits. Verily may they say, "We have left undone those things which we ought to have done, and we have done those things which we ought not to have done."

One thing more, and I am done. When these papers were referred to the committee there were not twenty members on this floor who knew what papers were to go, and I do not believe there are fifty members now who know what papers did go. It is all-important that we observe the law. There are ugly features about this case that can be disposed of rightly on the merits when reached. It is hard cases that make bad precedents, and I give you the admonition now, it is bad precedents that open the way for the invasion of the sacred domain where life, liberty, the property and the rights of good men ought to be secure.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I recognize the difficult and delicate duty which I have to perform in concluding a debate which has already occupied so much of the attention of the House. If it were left to my own desire and taste that debate would be followed at this time by a vote on the question. Had there not been harsh strictures made upon the action of the committee I should now take the judgment of the House. Before the curtain drops on what the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] the other day called a "a non-partisan judicial performance," I feel it to be due to my honorable and able colleagues to make some reply to these attacks.

In the first place, some gentlemen have stated we misapprehended our instructions from the House. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] led off in that criticism. If I may keep up the similitude of a judicial performance, I beg leave to exercise the right of recrimination. I charge him with a misapprehension of the judgment which the committee has reported to the House.

His argument was based upon the premise that the majority of the Committee on Elections had come back here with a report on the final merits of the case against Mr. Manning. I need not take the time of the House to go over that report or refer to the resolution of the committee in order to show that the gentleman from New York was plainly and palpably mistaken. A gentleman who has thus himself misjudged the committee has no right to make a valid accusation against me of a misconception of my duty.

Let it never be forgotten that this Committee on Elections have not yet decided this case on its merits. That question is yet pending before the committee, and when it is reached in its order I promise the House that so far as I am concerned, notwithstanding the strictures which have been unfairly made on my conduct, I will give to the gentleman who holds this certificate from the governor of Mississippi the fairest, the most candid, and the most earnest consideration, and, I will add, with an anxiety on my part to find that the truth of the case lies on his side of the contest.

That is a question which this House still has to determine, and it is a question not now under consideration. The question now before the House is whether, two months and more after the organization of the House, pending this contest on the great issues of the case, the House will determine upon the evidence submitted whether the one party or the other is entitled to enjoy the stake involved in the litigation during the further contention between them.

Gentlemen have spoken here about our having tried Mr. Manning. One gentleman, high in my estimation, took occasion the other day to say that we had absolutely court-martialed him; that we had not been even so fair as a court-martial would have been, because we had garbled the evidence that had been submitted to us.

Sir, that was a most serious imputation upon the integrity of a committee charged with the most solemn responsibility. I propose briefly to reply to it. That honorable gentleman stated that when we came to consider the question of Mr. Manning's answer in this case we had taken that part which suited our purpose and had ignored and suppressed the rest.

Now, if that gentleman had done us justice he would have looked through the report of the committee, and he would have seen that the statement is made there broadly and conspicuously that Mr. Manning in his answer also charged upon his adversary fraud, intimidation, corrupt use of official patronage, and bribery. We stated they were grave accusations; and if I may go further I will state that that was the reason, in order to give effect to the entire answer as evidence in the case, that I for one declined to sign a report in favor of Mr. Chalmers. I want these grave issues tried.

When we came to look at the answer there were two questions raised. One was whether Mr. Manning was entitled to a certificate; the other question was whether on the merits of the case Mr. Manning or Mr. Chalmers should be declared elected on the final result. We looked at the answer and we saw the admission on the first question, and we have reserved the other part of the answer and expect to try that other question with the best ability we can use.

Mr. HERBERT. Does the gentleman refer to me?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. The honorable gentleman who did not mince his words was himself. I will not use in reference to him the word he used in reference to us, but I will say that he has been guilty of a more serious infringement of propriety than we have been.

That gentleman admitted that we had the right, under the resolution of the House, to consider the certificate and all the papers which had been filed with the Clerk. Then he denied that we had the right to consider the answer of Mr. Manning at all, and undertook to read from the running debate which took place on the first and second days of this session to show that no such thing as the answer of Mr. Manning was referred to. If the gentleman will refer to his remarks he will see that that is his argument, and it is on that foundation that he rests his theory that we have gone to the answer of Mr. Manning without authority. He says the answer was not referred to. Let us try that by the record.

Mr. HERBERT. Is the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] referring to me?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I am referring to the gentleman himself.

Mr. HERBERT. I think if the gentleman will read my remarks he will see that I said there was no authority whatever to have read in evidence anything except the certificate filed with the Clerk. He will find that that was what I said. I did not say that the answer was not referred to, because the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], when the matter was first brought up in the House, did say, as a reason why he objected to Mr. Manning being sworn in, that there was a statement on file to the effect that Mr. Manning said he would not be sworn in until the question was decided by the House.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I resume the floor and decline to submit to further interruption. Gentlemen who heard his remarks will bear witness that I have not misconstrued their tenor. I have not time to read his remarks, although I have them before me.

Now, on the issue between the gentleman from Alabama and myself, I refer to the opening paragraph of the debate which occurred upon this question on the first day of this session. I read from the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] on the twenty-second page of the report:

> I desire to state to the House that Mr. Manning himself never accepted the certificate; and I will state further, if it is to be treated as accepted, that he has put upon the files of the House a statement which shows that he was beaten in that election by 980 votes. This is in his answer as formally filed.

If gentlemen can go through the running remarks of members on this floor for two days to ascertain what the House meant by its final action, ought they not to take the entire debate? And if the debate is to be the source from which to derive the construction of the resolution where it refers to all the papers in the case, I submit whether the answer here referred to during the debate is not included in the reference.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman will allow me simply to state——

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I have but a moment; and the gentleman himself declined to yield.

Mr. HERBERT. I submit, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia declines to yield.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that if the debate on which gentlemen rely here is to be any guide in determining the effect of the resolution which finally embodied the sentiment of the House, the whole debate must be taken. The debate must not be—I was going to use a harsh word—it must not be mutilated.

I affirm that where the language of a statute or resolution is plain and unambiguous there is no rule of construction which will allow you to go outside of it to determine its meaning.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what was the question referred to the committee? Why, sir, the gentleman who was the draughtsman of the minority report concedes in effect in that report that the language of the resolution was not only broad enough to cover all these papers but broad enough to take in the pleadings in the case. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROADHEAD], who has also occupied the floor in opposition to our report, had the frankness and candor to state that the committee had not misconstrued their powers or their duties but had acted in strict conformity to the letter of the resolution.

But, Mr. Speaker, I will not attempt by anything further on my part to support the construction which the majority of the committee have put upon the resolution. It is plain and unmistakable. It came to a committee of this House from the House itself, which is our master in this matter. If gentlemen gave unanimous consent to a resolution which they did not understand, that is their fault, not the fault of the committee.

Mr. Speaker, there has been much dispute and contention on this floor as to what is meant by a prima facie case. Allow me briefly to advert to this matter again. I stated the other day, and I repeat, that this phrase, according to its early use, applied to the apparent right of a member-elect to a seat during the process of organization. I stated further that, according to the history of all the cases which I have seen, where the prima facie question was referred to a committee after the House had organized the phrase always went beyond that definition. Why, Mr. Speaker, take the case of the claimants to a seat from a district as to which the governor issued a certificate to nobody. Have there not been numerous cases in which the House, by resolution similar in language to that under which the House instructed us, has instructed the Committee on Elections to determine the prima facie right to the seat? Will gentlemen who apply this phrase to the governor's certificate alone tell us what it means in the reports of those cases in which no certificate was issued to anybody?

I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] for having spared me one other topic of discussion, for he has exhausted the legal argument.

My honorable friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] took the floor today and advised the House about this prima facie right, and as to what course the House should pursue on this question. My learned friend from Alabama, the other day, who delights in classical phrases (and I beg to state whenever a man wants to be very accurate he takes refuge in a Latin phrase)—my friend from Alabama referred to this question and some other as in consimili casu. I want to put my friend from Virginia in that sort of a predicament. [Laughter.] On the second day of the session that gentleman submitted a resolution which was in this language:

Resolved, That the certificates and all other papers relating to the election of a Representative of the first Congressional district of Virginia in the Forty-eighth Congress be referred to the Committee on Elections when appointed, with instructions to report at as early a day as practicable which of the rival claimants to the seat from that district has the prima facie right thereto, reserving to the other party the privilege of contesting the case upon the merits.

I ask whether that is not in consimili casu? [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to the remarks which the honorable gentleman from Virginia made on that occasion:

The other question is, what is a return?—

That is to say, who has been properly returned to a seat in this House—

Here is a return made by the secretary of the Commonwealth based upon the action of the canvassing board—

I will remark, in passing, that in that State it is the secretary of the Commonwealth who signs the commissions of members—and the question is, whether that return is tainted with fraud, irregularity, illegality, or based upon a miscount.

I am glad to see the gentleman in front of me. [Laughter.]

It is not a question of the election, because that comes back to the voting at the polls. The question is as to the counting of the votes; and the counting of the votes by this canvassing board was a miscount, because it left out a part of the constituency that was to be represented.

Now, sir, on the very next page the gentleman repeats that proposition in even stronger language; and if I had time and if it were necessary to cumulate the gentleman's authority on that proposition I could cite from a very able and learned argument made by him on a conspicuous occasion (the trial before the electoral commission) when he again laid down the doctrine in precise and scientific language which has become familiar to all lawyers.

Gentlemen on the other side of the Hall who concur with me in this case will, I confidently believe, follow me in the Garrison and if in consimili casu, I will then claim the congratulations of my Democratic friends on the ability and learning and number of the recruits I shall bring over from the other side of the Hall. [Laughter and applause.]

My honorable friend from Pennsylvania, who was himself once the governor of a great and glorious State, a State which in my judgment has produced more heroic precedents on the subject of popular rights than almost any other State in this Union, even Virginia herself scarcely excepted, has presented a resolution here for the consideration of the House in reference to this case. Why, sir, when that great issue was pending in the room of the Supreme Court, the result of which makes many of us on this side of the House hang our heads in shame, when that case was pending a distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, now dead—I refer to Jeremiah S. Black, venerabile nomen—a man who loved liberty in this country with a devotion equal to that with which he cherished the mother of his children, in his great argument before that tribunal said that it had always been held that the returns of votes which had not been cast, or the exclusion of votes which had been cast, or a miscount, was a fraud and a falsehood, which was void on its face and which no court would sustain. [Applause.] It seems that my friend from Virginia agreed with him on that great proposition.

Mr. Black also on that occasion referred to the New Jersey or "the great seal" case, and commended in the warmest terms the action of the House in excluding even during the process of organization the five members from that State who held the governor's certificate in perfect form. Mr. Black said: "In New Jersey the governor of that State stamped the broad seal upon a commission as members of Congress for five gentlemen whom he knew not to be elected. Congress said that certificate was void."

When these credentials came here having the great seal, which gentlemen so ardently reverence, but which it was known covered a great falsehood, the House, shocked at the enormity of the crime, even before organization broke over precedents in order to right the wrong.

I say, here and now, that I commend the action of the House of Representatives in the exercise of its omnipotent authority to prevent the consummation of that crime against liberty.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I should like to have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the time of the gentleman being extended for five minutes?

Mr. BENNETT. I object, unless five minutes are also given to gentlemen who take the other view.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] gave away thirty minutes of the time to which he was entitled. He was entitled to the whole hour himself.

Mr. TUCKER. I hope my friend from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT] will not insist on his objection. A courtesy of that kind was accorded to me this morning, and although the speech of my friend from Georgia has arraigned my consistency, I am perfectly willing he shall have five minutes more.

Mr. BENNETT. I based my objection on the ground that the gentleman from Virginia could not be heard in reply.

The SPEAKER. Is the objection withdrawn?

Mr. BENNETT. It is.

The SPEAKER. No further objection being made, the time of the gentleman from Georgia is extended for five minutes.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I am greatly indebted to the House and to the gentleman from Virginia. I desire again to say, Mr. Speaker, that if I should ever be charged as a public functionary with the duty of guarding popular rights, I for one would break over all narrow technical difficulties in order to consummate the popular will. I might split hairs on a precedent to effectuate the true result of an election, but I would trample on any small difficulties to prevent a foul wrong. [Applause]

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment proposed by the minority of the committee as a substitute for the resolution reported by the majority. The Clerk will read both the original resolution and the resolutions proposed by the minority. He will first report the resolution proposed by the majority of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the prima facie right to the seat in the contested-election case of J. R. Chalmers vs. Van H. Manning.

The SPEAKER. For the resolution just read the minority of the committee propose to substitute what the Clerk will now report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, First. That Hon. Van H. Manning holds perfect credentials, issued in due form and by lawful authority, as member-elect to the Forty-eighth Congress from the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi.

Second. That being the duly returned member, he is entitled to be sworn in and occupy the seat on this floor pending a contest on the merits over it.

Mr. COOK. I call for separate votes on the two resolutions proposed by the minority.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COOK] calls for a division of the question. The first question is upon agreeing to the first of the resolutions proposed by the minority of the committee as a substitute.

Mr. TUCKER. Let that be reported again.

The first of the minority resolutions was again reported.

Mr. CALKINS. That is proposed as a substitute for the resolution offered by the majority?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. CALKINS. I submit the resolutions of the minority are not divisible yet until they have been adopted as a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the question is divisible at this stage, because the House may determine to substitute one of these resolutions and not both of them. The House may agree to one and disagree to the other.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. As I understand, if the House should adopt the first of these resolutions it is merely as a substitute for the resolution proposed by the majority.

The SPEAKER. It is not adopted until it is agreed to by the House.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. That is to say, it requires another vote to agree to it?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. McMILLIN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BELFORD. The minority of the committee submit to the House, as I understand, two resolutions. The first declares, I believe, that Mr. Manning's credentials are regular in form. Now, if we are to vote upon agreeing to the minority report as a whole, does that allow the House a fair opportunity to express its views upon this question? May not these credentials be absolutely regular in form, and yet not constitute a prima facie case?

The SPEAKER. The next vote will be upon the second resolution, which declares Mr. Manning is entitled to be sworn in as a member of this House.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I rise to a question of order. Is not the question before the House whether the resolution just read shall be substituted for the resolution submitted by the majority of the committee? The question now, as I understand, is not upon agreeing finally to the resolution of the minority, but simply whether it shall be substituted.

The SPEAKER. If the House upon this vote should agree to the resolution just read, the next vote will be upon the second resolution; and if that should be agreed to, then the vote would be upon adopting the report as thus amended by substituting these two resolutions. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 106, nays 139, not voting 75; as follows:

Mr. WAIT. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with my colleague [Mr. EATON], who is detained from the House by illness. If he were here and I had the privilege of voting on this political question, I would vote "no."

The following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. MULLER and Mr. OCHILTREE, for to-day.

Mr. SPOONER and Mr. ROSECRANS, for to-day.

Mr. LEWIS and Mr. PAYSON, for to-day.

Mr. GEORGE and Mr. BUDD, for to-day.

Mr. BLOUNT and Mr. MCCORMICK, for to-day.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, and Mr. TOWNSHEND, for this day.

Mr. LAMB and Mr. KEAN, until further notice.

Mr. MILLS and Mr. WAKEFIELD, until further notice.

Mr. MURPHY and Mr. RUSSELL, until further notice.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, and Mr. ANDERSON, until further notice.

Mr. RANDALL and Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, from and including to-day until Wednesday next.

Mr. YOUNG and Mr. HOLMES, until further notice.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York, and Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, until further notice.

Mr. VALENTINE and Mr. HILL, until further notice.

Mr. BRUMM and Mr. HARDY, until further notice.

Mr. CABELL and Mr. HARMER, until further notice.

Mr. SLOCUM and Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey, until further notice.

Mr. PAIGE and Mr. MOREY, until further notice.

Mr. HAMMOND and Mr. KETCHAM, for ten days from the 14th instant.

Mr. WAIT and Mr. EATON, until further notice.

Mr. MILLIKEN and Mr. JORDAN, until the 18th instant, inclusive.

Mr. SENEY and Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR, until further notice.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE and Mr. SNYDER, on this question. Mr. WISE would vote in favor of the report of the majority of the committee and Mr. SNYDER in favor of the report of the minority.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to state that in managing the pairs for this side of the House I have learned that the gentleman paired with Mr. SLOCUM, of New York, did not understand it as the friends of Mr. SLOCUM did. In order that fair play may be done those gentlemen I ask leave to withdraw my vote and to announce myself as paired with Mr. SLOCUM.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the second resolution proposed by the minority of the Committee on Elections.

Mr. COOK. It is evidently useless to waste the time of the House in a further vote on the second proposition.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This is one vote in two parts, and we will have now the second part.

Mr. COOK. I desire to withdraw the second proposition.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. TALBOTT. Pending that I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust there will be a session to-morrow for debate only on the naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT], that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask the gentleman from Maryland to withdraw his motion and allow the naval appropriation bill to be discussed to-morrow.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. TALBOTT. I am perfectly willing so far as I am concerned.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If the gentleman withdraws his motion I shall demand the regular order.

Mr. TALBOTT. Then I will insist upon my motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I again ask unanimous consent that there be a session to-morrow for debate only.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to that. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] states that if the motion to adjourn over is withdrawn he will immediately demand the regular order, which would cut off the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn over; and upon a division there were—ayes 146, noes 31.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. DINGLEY called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 17 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

There being no further count, the motion to adjourn over was agreed to.

Mr. TALBOTT. I move now that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

ELECTION CONTEST—CHALMERS VS. MANNING.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the adoption of the second resolution proposed by the minority of the Committee on Elections as a substitute for the resolution reported by the majority of that committee in the contested-election case of Chalmers vs. Manning.

Mr. TALBOTT. Let the resolution be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Second. That being the duly returned member he is entitled to be sworn in and occupy the seat on this floor pending a contest on the merits over it.

Mr. FINDLAY and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being 67 in the affirmative—more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 91, nays 157, not voting 72; as follows:

YEAS—91.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the resolution reported by the majority of the committee.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 113, noes 55.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. RANNEY moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARKSDALE. What has become of my amendment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman in the course of his remarks and before the voting commenced had an amendment read.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I offered it, and supposed it would be pending.

The SPEAKER. It was not offered in order and was not pending.

SENATE.

MONDAY, February 18, 1884.

Prayer by Rev. C. A. EVANS, of Atlanta, Ga.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS OF SENATOR FROM IOWA.

Mr. WILSON. I present the credentials of Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON, Senator-elect from the State of Iowa, for the term commencing March 4, 1885. In this connection I will state that owing to a doubt as to the proper construction of the statute of the United States regulating the election of Senators, it has been the custom of the General Assembly of Iowa to hold two elections, one on the second Tuesday after the meeting and temporary organization of the General Assembly and the other on the second Tuesday after the permanent organization. Both of those elections have taken place and are certified in the credentials which I present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa presents the credentials of WILLIAM B. ALLISON, Senator-elect from the State of Iowa, and explains the circumstance why two sets of credentials are presented. Each set of credentials will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the credentials, as follows:

THE STATE OF IOWA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Des Moines, February 5, 1884.

To the PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate of the United States:

This will certify that, at a convention in joint assembly of the two houses of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, a majority of all the members of each house being present, the same being the Legislature of said State chosen next preceding the expiration of the term of Senator in Congress which began on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1879, and for which WILLIAM B. ALLISON was originally chosen, held at 12 o'clock m. of Wednesday, the 23d day of January, 1884, it was found, upon reading the journals of the senate and house of representatives, respectively, of said General Assembly, that each of said houses had on the day before, to wit, Tuesday, the 22d day of January, A. D. 1884, the same being the second Tuesday after the meeting and temporary organization of said General Assembly, openly, by a viva voce vote of each member present, named, by a majority of all the votes therein, WILLIAM B. ALLISON, of Dubuque County, for Senator in Congress from said State: whereupon the said WILLIAM B. ALLISON was declared duly elected Senator in Congress from the State of Iowa for the term of six years beginning on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1885.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused to be affixed the great seal of the State. Done at Des Moines this 5th day of February, 1884.

BUREN R. SHERMAN,
Governor of Iowa.

By the governor:
J. A. T. HULL,
Secretary of State.

STATE OF IOWA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Des Moines, February 5, 1884.

To the PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate of the United States:

This will certify that at a convention in joint assembly of the two houses of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, a majority of all the members of each house being present, the same being the Legislature of said State chosen next preceding the expiration of the term of Senator in Congress which began on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1879, and for which WILLIAM B. ALLISON was originally chosen, held at 12 o'clock m. of Wednesday, the 30th day of January, 1884, it was found, upon reading the journals of the senate and house of representatives, respectively, of said General Assembly, that each of said houses had on the day before, to wit, Tuesday, the 29th day of January, A. D. 1884, the same being the second Tuesday after the meeting and permanent organization of said General Assembly, openly, by a viva voce vote of each member present, named, by a majority of all the votes therein, WILLIAM B. ALLISON, of Dubuque County, for Senator in Congress from said State: whereupon the said WILLIAM B. ALLISON was declared duly elected Senator in Congress from the State of Iowa for the term of six years beginning on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1885.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused to be affixed the great seal of the State. Done at Des Moines this 5th day of February, 1884.

BUREN R. SHERMAN,
Governor of Iowa.

By the governor:
J. A. T. HULL,
Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will be placed on file.

Mr. GARLAND. There is no doubt that our distinguished friend has been well elected, and is well and thoroughly certified by the authorities of Iowa; but the double sets of credentials suggest a difficulty in my mind that I want to have obviated, if it can be done. The statement made by the Senator from Iowa who presented the credentials shows that there is some difficulty there in the organization of the Legislature in complying literally or substantially with the act of Congress of 1866.

I move to refer the credentials—not of course raising any question as to the election of my friend—to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with instructions to inquire as to what is the necessity of two sets of credentials, and if there is any difficulty in the law to suggest a remedy, and to report by bill or otherwise. I see there is some question by the presentation of the credentials of the Senator from Iowa, and necessarily there must be some trouble there in having two sets of credentials.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved by the Senator from Arkansas that the credentials be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections with instructions to inquire into the circumstances and the state of the law bearing upon the subject of two sets of credentials.

Mr. WILSON. This is not an exceptional case in the history of the election of United States Senators in Iowa. Ever since the passage of the act of 1866 regulating the election of United States Senators by the States a double election has been held in Iowa, growing out of the fact, as I before stated, that a doubt exists as to whether a temporary organization comes within the meaning of the act of Congress. Supposing that such a construction might be given to that act, the Legislature has proceeded to elect on the second Tuesday after the meeting and temporary organization of the General Assembly; and in order to meet a possible construction to the effect that the temporary organization would not be within the meaning of the law, they have proceeded on the second Tuesday after the permanent organization to elect again. The doubt is as to the construction of the law concerning the proper day on which the election should be held. Of course, under this mode of procedure in our General Assembly, if it should be held that the second Tuesday after the meeting and temporary organization is the right day, the first election is good. If, on the other hand, it should be held that the second Tuesday after the meeting and permanent organization of the General Assembly is the day, then the second election is good, and in either event the statute of the United States is complied with.

Mr. GARLAND. It is not for any captious purpose or to raise any objection, I want the Senator to understand, that I make the motion. I make it in absolute good faith. There is a difficulty arising from the statement made by the Senator from Iowa which might present itself to the Senate at some time. Our distinguished friend is fortunate enough to have been elected twice. It might be, however, that some time after the meeting and permanent organization the Legislature might change its mind and might not be so fortunate or unfortunate as to elect the man who was first elected, and we should have two gentlemen here presenting credentials for the seat. It is true it is well determined that when a Legislature has once elected it cannot recall the election; the act is done; but then if they go on after the permanent organization and say: "We will take another turn at this thing; our minds have changed," they might elect some person else, and we should be presented with a difficulty here at once.

So it is best, I think, to have this matter looked into, and if the law can be so shaped as to explain this difficulty away we shall only have one set of credentials hereafter. For that reason I made the motion, not for the purpose of obstruction or for the purpose of throwing any difficulty in the way.

Mr. WILSON. I quite agree with the Senator from Arkansas that this doubt should be resolved by such an amendment of the law, if an amendment be necessary, as will meet the case. Therefore I have no objection to the reference of the credentials to the Committee on Privileges and Elections by way of giving them jurisdiction of the question, that they may examine and report such remedy as may be deemed necessary and proper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to refer the credentials to the Commitee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 6th instant, copies of the opinions of the Second Comptroller in certain claims for longevity pay of naval officers under the act of August 5, 1882, and statements of the number and amounts of claims allowed by the Fourth Auditor and Second Comptroller under that act; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 6th instant, a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office relative to the disposition of Silver Lake, in Caddo Parish, Louisiana, under the acts donating swamp lands to that State; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in response to a resolution of the 22d ultimo, information concerning the status and extent of certain lands in the Indian Territory, the necessity for keeping them in their present condition of occupancy, &c.; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the letter, with the accompanying papers, except the map, which the Chair will not of his own motion direct to be printed or engraved, as it is expensive, will be printed and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. If the committee are of opinion that the map ought to be engraved, they can report upon the subject.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 3934) relating to recoveries for infringements of patents was read twice by its title.

Mr. PLATT. That bill passed the other House, as I remember, on the 23d of January. I should like to know why it has been so long in transmission to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not advised. It was received at the desk of the presiding officer at the time of the last sitting, but after the hour for its being laid before the Senate had gone by.

Mr. PLATT. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents a resolution of the Legislature of Ohio, concerning the subject of Government inspection of pork, transmitted to the Chair by the governor of that State. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

Senate joint resolution relative to recommending to Congress a Government inspection of pork in certain cases.

Whereas American pork has been excluded from the markets of France and Germany for nearly four years, thereby causing great loss to the hog-raisers of Ohio and other States; and

Whereas the alleged reason for such exclusion (the diseased condition of American pork) we believe to be without foundation in fact: Therefore,

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That we would recommend to our members of Congress a system of Government inspection of meats exported to foreign countries that will prohibit the exportation of all meats not in a healthy condition, or such other legislation, either retaliatory or otherwise, as may be necessary to remove the restrictions now placed by France and Germany upon American pork.

Resolved further, That the governor be requested to forward to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of these resolutions.

L. A. BRUNNER,
Speaker pro tempore of the House of Representatives.
JOHN G. WARWICK,
President of the Senate.

Adopted February 5, 1884.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents another joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, on the subject of pensions for prisoners in the late rebellion, transmitted to the Chair by the governor of that State. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions, as follows:

Joint resolution requesting Senators and Representatives in Congress to secure pensions for survivors of prisons of the South during the late rebellion.

Whereas many Union soldiers, prisoners of war, were confined in Libby, Andersonville, and other Southern prisons during the late war of the rebellion, and by reason of said imprisonment and the consequent sufferings entailed thereby the general health and constitutional vitality of those who survived said imprisonment was so impaired as to bring on a premature breaking down of general health and of the vital powers; and

Whereas it is but simple justice to those deserving and patriotic men that their strong claims to the sympathy of the country should receive such recognition as their merit, suffering, and patriotic services demand: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Ohio are hereby requested to use their influence in the Congress of the United States to procure the passage of an act granting pensions to those surviving soldiers, prisoners of war, confined in Southern prisons, as above recited.

Resolved further, That the governor be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to each of our Senators and Members in Congress a copy of these resolutions.

A. D. MARSH,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOHN G. WARWICK,
President of the Senate.

Approved February 14, 1884.

Mr. HARRISON. I present the petition of Bartlett Tripp and other citizens of the Territory of Dakota, a committee representing a convention assembled at Sioux Falls on the 4th day of September last for the purpose of framing a constitution for that portion of the Territory lying south of the forty-sixth parallel. This committee present a memorial, accompanied by a copy of the constitution and other papers, asking Congress for admission as a State under the constitution framed. I move that the petition and papers be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I have here resolutions adopted by Sion S. Bass Post, No. 40, Grand Army of the Republic, of Fort Wayne, Ind., and resolutions adopted by Gus. Abbott Post, No. 113, Grand Army of the Republic, of Waymansville, Ind., in favor of certain relief measures. These resolutions are not framed precisely according to the rule, but as they distinctly ask for Congressional action I ask leave to present them, and move that they be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON presented a petition of members of Root Post, No. 58, Grand Army of the Republic, located at Denison, Iowa, praying Congress to pass an act granting one hundred and sixty acres of land to each honorably discharged United States soldier of the war for the Union; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Keokuk Typographical Union of Keokuk, Iowa, in favor of the enactment of such measures as will protect American artisans from foreign pauper contract labor; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Lee Assembly, No. 2595, of the Order of Knights of Labor of North America, at a meeting in Keokuk, Iowa, in favor of the passage of such laws as will prevent the laboring masses from being brought into competition with imported pauper labor; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Iowa State Medical Society, favoring the erection of a substantial fire-proof building for the medical library and museum of the War Department; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I present a preamble and resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Saint Paul, Minn., in the nature of a memorial, remonstrating against the forfeiture by Congress of the grant of lands to the Northern Pacific Railroad. This is not formally addressed to either House of Congress, but from the body of the resolutions evidently the action was intended by that body as a petition to Congress. Such petitions have usually been referred to what committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. INGALLS in the chair). The Chair is informed by the Secretary that similar resolutions have been referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I move the reference of the resolutions to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I also present resolutions of the Board of Trade of Minneapolis, Minn., remonstrating against the forfeiture of the grant of lands to the Northern Pacific Railroad, both of these communications having been received by me from the officers of the two respective organizations. I move that these resolutions be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Seattle, Wash., praying that that place be made a port of delivery for the collection district of Puget Sound; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

I shall at the proper time introduce a bill in accordance with the prayer of the petition. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a memorial of the Erie (Pennsylvania) Board of Trade, remonstrating against the extension of the grain-shovel patents. As the bill on that subject has been reported favorably, I move that the memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I present a petition of citizens of Kansas, concerning certain legislation abridging the rights of inventors. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I present a resolution of the Board of Trade of the city of Topeka, Kans., in regard to the embargo now placed upon American pork in Germany and elsewhere. I ask that the resolution be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

TOPEKA, KANS., February 7, 1884.

Senator P. B. PLUMB, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: At a meeting of the Topeka Board of Trade, held 6th instant, I was instructed to forward to our members of Congress the following resolution:

Whereas the Governments of Germany, France, and Switzerland, in the interests and for the protection of their home-grown pork, have maligned the American hog and prohibited the importation of American pork into their respective countries:

Resolved, That the Board of Trade of the city of Topeka ask our Senators and Representatives in Congress to pass proper laws for the restriction of the importation of all spirituous, malt, and alcoholic liquors into the United States, as they are well known to be vile compounds, detrimental to health, morals, and to our pockets; also of the importation of all woolens and all articles of luxury, from the above-named countries.

Respectfully, yours,

GEORGE D. HALE,
Secretary Board of Trade.

Mr. PLUMB presented a memorial adopted at the third annual encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, remonstrating against the abolition of pension agencies; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Kansas, praying that an appropriation be made for education in Alaska; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PLATT. I present some papers relating to the claim of Evelyn P. Low for a pension, and move that they be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1385) to carry into effect the conclusion and recommendation of a board of rear-admirals convened under a joint resolution approved February 5, 1879, in the case of Capt. Henry Erben, United States Navy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a message of the President of the United States, commmunicating a letter from the Secretary of the Interior upon the subject, reported a bill (S. 1564) providing for the allotment of lands in severalty to certain Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior, residing in the State of Wisconsin, and granting patents therefor; which was read twice by its title, and, on motion of Mr. DAWES, recommitted to the Committee on Indians Affairs.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 493) for the relief of C. S. Moss, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; which was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. The Committee on Public Lands have instructed me to report back the bill (S. 1355) to confirm the homestead entry of Hugh Foster adversely, for the reason that a bill in precisely the same language has already been reported upon by the committee favorably, and is upon the Calendar. I move that this bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally adversely, and they were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 794) for the reclamation of arid and waste lands in certain Western States and Territories; and

A bill (S. 1489) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on reservoirs, mains, and laterals for irrigation and other purposes in the arid-land region of the United States.

Mr. MAHONE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 574) appropriating money for the purchase of a site and the erection of a suitable building for the United States courts, post-office, and other Government offices in the city of Winona, State of Minnesota, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1117) for the erection of a public building at Macon, Ga., reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 854) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Manchester, in the State of New Hampshire, reported it with amendments.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1563) providing for the punishment of persons falsely personating officers and employés of the United States, reported it with amendments.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 210) donating to the city of Saint Louis, Mo., a certain strip of land for street purposes, reported it without amendment.

DU PONT STATUE.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report favorably without amendment the bill (S. 1490) to complete a statue of the late Rear-Admiral Samuel Francis Du Pont, United States Navy.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask for the present consideration of that bill. It is one in which I take strong personal interest, and I desire that the bill shall pass the Senate now in order that it may receive the early attention of the other House.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the bill be reported for information.

The bill was read; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It appropriates $3,200, being the unexpended balance of the sum appropriated under an act entitled "An act making an appropriation for the base and pedestal of a monument to the late Rear-Admiral Samuel Francis Du Pont, United States Navy," approved February 25, 1882, together with the further sum of $10,500 for the erection and completion of a statue of the late Rear-Admiral Samuel Francis Du Pont, United States Navy, to be placed in Du Pont Circle, in the city of Washington.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 1565) for the admission of the State of Dakota into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HARRISON. This is the bill framed and submitted by the committee whose memorial I presented. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a bill (S. 1576) for the relief of Adelicia Cheatham; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers and the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think it had better go to the Judiciary Committee. It contemplates the transfer of trust funds and the winding up of a corporation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 1579) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri river at or near Decatur, Burt County, Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, introduced a bill (S. 1580) for the relief of John H. Kinkead, of Nevada, and others; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 62) for the relief of Edwin B. Hay; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the Chair to designate the committee to which the joint resolution should be referred. It has reference to a claim for pay as a witness in a contested-election case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That the papers on the files of the Senate in the case of John M. McClintock (S. 1581, forty-fifth Congress and S. 672, forty-seventh Congress) be referred to the Senate Committee on Finance.

SPECIAL MESSENGER FOR COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. PIKE. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ and to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate at the usual rate of compensation a special messenger for the Committee on Claims during the absence upon official business of the regular messenger of that committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the resolution should, under the rule, be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. PIKE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. JACKSON was excused from further service on the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River on his own motion.

REMOVAL OF CONGRESSIONAL EMPLOYÉS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions" the order of morning business is closed. The pending bill on the Calendar under the eighth rule of the Senate will be announced.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. May I ask what has become of the resolution offered by me eight or ten days ago, and which is still pending on the Calendar of morning business? The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] had the floor at the time the resolution was last under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that under the ruling of the President pro tempore the resolution took its place upon the Calendar of General Orders, subject to action when it is reached, or it may be called up by a majority of the Senate at any time.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I have no intention of calling it up this morning. I only made the inquiry so as to know its status.

Mr. CONGER. Has there been any decision from the Chair upon that particular resolution as to its status?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution having been under discussion on a former day and undetermined, it was held, under the direction of the President pro tempore, that it took its place on the Calendar of General Orders at the foot of the Calendar of that day. It will be found as Order of Business No. 192.

Mr. CONGER. I had heard no statement of that at the time its consideration was terminated by the expiration of the morning hour, and I stated to the Chair that I held the floor until the next morning. Other business intervening, the resolution has been passed over from day to day. I suppose under the rule of business in the morning hour the discussion of a resolution which belongs in the morning hour comes up as the business of the next morning, as other resolutions have done from day to day, subject to be called up at any time when resolutions are considered. I do not care particularly about calling up that resolution this morning, but I insist that it has its place, and that under the rules it has no other place except to come up when such resolutions are being considered.

I call the attention of the present occupant of the chair to this matter to ascertain its condition, not for the purpose of affecting that case this morning, but it is important, I think, that we should know that a resolution under discussion, cut off by reason of the termination of the morning hour, should be taken up the next day when the order of resolutions is reached, and continued until it is concluded or the business of that hour has been finished. It would be the first business under the order of resolutions the next morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Michigan that there is no unfinished business of the morning hour.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Michigan will allow me, as this resolution took its place on the Calendar on the day after it was being considered in the morning hour under the construction of the new rules by the President pro tempore of the Senate, I suggest to him, if he desires to raise the question of order, that he do so at some time when the President pro tempore, who made the order placing the resolution upon the Calendar in its present position, is himself in the chair.

Mr. CONGER. That is what I proposed to do this morning, and I called the attention of the present occupant of the chair to the matter so that there should be no decision finally upon that question, but that the resolution might come up at some time. It has not been brought up in any public order of business, for I have been present continuously during the morning hour until this morning. It was not brought up the next morning, and has not been to this time. There has been no decision of that disposition of the resolution publicly announced, nor has the question been raised since the resolution was last under discussion. I have told gentlemen who applied to me in regard to it that the resolution had its place, in my judgment, being cut off by the arrival of 2 o'clock, whenever the order of resolutions was reached the next day, or the next, or at any time, and I still think that should be the proper construction of the rule.

I do not press it this morning, but make these remarks that attention may be called to it and a decision made by the Chair which shall apply to other cases as well as this hereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would state that the resolution is subject to the order of a majority of the Senate at any time between now and 2 o'clock.

Mr. CONGER. But as I understand there has been no time when the resolution has come up in any order; and that not by either the public direction of the President of the Senate or by the action of the Senate has it been placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No decision has been made by the President pro tempore and no action has been taken by the Senate. The officer whose duty it is to make up the Calendar placed the resolution in its present position under the direction of the President pro tempore.

Mr. CONGER. Both the action of the officer and that of the President pro tempore was, in my judgment, a departure from the proper rule of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no share in that controversy.

Mr. CONGER. As the present occupant of the chair did not make the direction, I will reserve my criticism upon it until the President of the Senate is present himself.

UNION METALLIC CARTRIDGE COMPANY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the pending bill on the Calendar under Rule VIII, being Senate bill No. 420.

Mr. PLUMB. At a previous sitting of the Senate I objected to the consideration of the bill (S. 399) for the relief of Albert H. Emery for the purpose of having an opportunity to examine the report, not at all for the purpose of defeating its passage by the objection. While I am not prepared to vote for the bill, at the same time I desire to withdraw the objection, in order that it may take its former place, if that be proper, for consideration under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the Committee on Patents to the bill (S. 420) for the relief of the Union Metallic Cartridge Company.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 420) for the relief of the Union Metallic Cartridge Company, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Patents to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $30,702.60 to the Union Metallic Cartridge Company, of Bridgeport, Conn., for the use by the Government of their patented machines for heading cartridge-cases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been read at length, and the question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. PLATT. When this bill was under consideration on Friday the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] asked to be referred to the case which had been adjudicated between this claimant and private parties, in which the rate of compensation had been established. The bill was reported by the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM], who had the papers, and who I supposed would explain the case to the Senate, if explanation was necessary. The Senator from New York is absent now by direction of the Senate, but I believe that I am familiar enough with the circumstances of the case to make an explanation. The bill was reported at the last session in the same shape that it is reported this year, but was not reached on the Calendar.

There is no question in this case but that the claimant has a valid patent. The Government has never questioned it. The Government has been using this patent at the Frankford arsenal. The only question which has ever arisen between the Government and this claimant is as to the amount of compensation which he should receive for the use of his patent. That compensation has been, as the committee think, conclusively settled in a case brought by this claimant, the Union Metallic Cartridge Company, against the United States Cartridge Company in the circuit court for the district of Massachusetts. The case was defended by Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, who, I believe, is also the principal party in interest in the United States Cartridge Company, and was very thoroughly tried and the whole question of damages very thoroughly gone into. I hold in my hand the report of the master, setting out the details of the damages in that case. The report of the master was objected to by the defendant, Benjamin F. Butler. It was argued at great length before Judge Lowell and Mr. Justice Clifford—Judge Lowell of the circuit court of Massachusetts and Mr. Justice Clifford of the United States Supreme Court sitting with him. That report was sustained in the case which is reported in the seventh volume of Federal Reporter. The concluding clause in the opinion is this:

I have considered all the other points presented, but do not find it necessary to refer to them in detail. I do not find that either the original decree or the master's report has been successfully assailed, and I affirm the finding of profits as assessed at $40,367.26.

In making up the damages in this case the same rule has been adopted that was adopted by the master in that case; the same rule is applied to the Government in ascertaining what damages it should pay to the patentee as was adopted in that case, and I am very sure that the calculation is correct and accurate. There is no doubt, the law is well settled, that the United States if it uses an invention is liable to the same measure of damages that an individual is liable to for the use of an invention. That is certainly decided in the fifth volume of Nott & Huntington's Court of Claims Reports in the case of William Wheeler Hubbell against the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Patents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPRESSION OF OPIUM TRAFFIC.

The bill (S. 1158) to provide for the execution of the provisions of article 2 of the supplemental commercial treaty of November 17, 1880, between the United States and China, for the repression of the opium traffic, was announced as next in order.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Since that bill was reported I have received through the State Department, from the representative of the United States at Pekin, certain information which renders it necessary that this bill be amended in two or three particulars. The amendments are important, and, although I have them drawn up, I do not desire to offer them without their first being passed upon by the Committee on Foreign Relations. I therefore ask that this bill be passed over without prejudice until these amendments can be submitted to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California asks that the bill be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

KINSEY B. CECIL.

The bill (S. 355) to confirm the title to certain lands in Platte County, Missouri, and authorize patents to be issued to Kinsey B. Cecil was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that George Smith, on the 9th of April, 1862, made entry at the United States land office at Boonville, Mo., of certain land situated in the county of Platte, which is described; that Joseph Meyer, on the 9th of April, 1862, made entry at the land office at Boonville, Mo., of certain other described land; and that the purchase-money for these fractions of land is still retained by the Government of the United States, and the lands have long since passed into the hands of innocent purchasers, who have occupied the same, paid taxes, and made valuable improvements thereon, having had no notice that the entries had been canceled until recently; therefore the bill confirms the entries, and directs patents to be issued to Kinsey B. Cecil, the assignee of George Smith and Joseph Meyer.

Mr. GARLAND. Is there a report in the case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no printed report.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no printed report. The recitals in the bill are established by the records of the Land Office. These two parties entered these fractions of land, about twenty acres altogether, a long time ago, and they were sold and conveyed to Mr. Cecil and are now in his hands. Some defects in the original entries were discovered in the Land Office and the entries were suspended. This is simply to confirm them.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the preamble.

The preamble was agreed to.

HUGH FOSTER.

The bill (S. 289) to confirm the homestead entry of Hugh Foster was considered as in Committe of the Whole. It proposes to confirm Hugh Foster's homestead entry numbered 1790, made at the United States land office at Marquette, Mich., March 22, 1879, under authority of the instructions of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the local officers dated July 2, 1878, and recommended for confirmation by special act of Congress by the Secretary of the Interior in the decision on the case rendered November 18, 1881.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN WAISHKEY, JR.

The bill (S. 290) to confirm the homestead entry of John Waishkey, jr., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to confirm the homestead entry numbered 1828, made at the United States land office at Marquette, Mich., May 8, 1879, by John Waishkey, jr., under authority of the instructions of the Commissioner of the General Land Office dated July 2, 1878.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE K. OTIS.

The bill (S. 639) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue to George K. Otis duplicates of certain land-warrants lost while in the possession of the officers of the Government was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for issuing to George K. Otis duplicates of three Porterfield land-warrants, issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved April 11, 1860, numbered 16, 17, and 120, respectively, upon satisfactory proof of ownership and loss of the same.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in line 9, after the word "same," to insert:

And the execution of a bond, with good and sufficient sureties in double the market value of the warrants so to be issued, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, conditioned to indemnify the United States against the presentation by an innocent holder of the alleged lost warrants.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH F. WILSON.

The bill (S. 442) for the relief of Joseph F. Wilson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the issue to Joseph F. Wilson, of Peoria, Ill., or his legal representatives or assigns, of a number of warrants equal to eighty acres in tracts not less than the subdivisions provided for in the United States land laws, to be located by Wilson or his legal representatives or assigns on any of the unoccupied and unappropriated public lands of the United States subject to preemption or homestead entry, in lieu of the west half of the northeast quarter of section 19, in township 35 north, of range 5 west, situate in Porter County, Indiana, which tract of land was entered by and patented to Josiah Smith, of Macon County, Missouri, under and by virtue of the provisions of the acts of Congress approved June 8, 1872, and March 3, 1873, relating to additional homesteads, and by Josiah Smith, after his entry, sold and conveyed to Wilson.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in line 12, after the word "homestead," to strike out "entry" and insert "settlement."

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator reporting the bill if the warrant to be issued is of the same character and force and value as the one which was located.

Mr. PLUMB. It is to the same effect exactly.

Mr. COCKRELL. Some warrants are much more valuable than others, being locatable on different kinds of land. If this is of the same character as the one first located by Josiah Smith, all right.

Mr. PLUMB. This is a case where a man made an entry upon a valuable piece of land in the State of Indiana, where it was held by the court that a prior entry, although it had been suspended, was a valid entry, and the man who had entered last, although he had a patent, held in trust for the man who had made the former entry. This man was therefore displaced from a very valuable holding. He is now to get simply eighty acres of land of the public domain, from such as is subject to homestead settlement, to replace it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will suggest an amendment, in line 34, after name "Josiah Smith," to insert "or any one claiming under him;" so as to read:

And the lands taken, selected, and located as authorized and provided for by this act shall be in full satisfaction of any claim, right, or benefit which the said Josiah Smith, or any one claiming under him, may have, or may have had, under and by virtue of the provisions of said acts of Congress.

Mr. PLUMB. There can be no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is first on the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

QUORUM OF SUPREME COURT.

The bill (S. 309) to amend section 673 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the quorum of the Supreme Court of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. GARLAND. This bill was reported by myself from the Committee on the Judiciary. There is no objection that I am aware of to the first clause of the bill, making a majority of the Supreme Court constitute a quorum, instead of six, as now required, there being nine in all. It has been found sometimes very difficult to have a quorum here at the time fixed by law for the meeting of the Supreme Court, and we have adopted in this bill the usual meaning of the word "quorum," that a majority shall constitute a quorum.

To the second provision of the bill when it was reported before there was some objection; that is, that no judge of the Supreme Court shall sit on an appeal in a case that he had passed upon in the court below. That elicited some little debate before and the question was not then disposed of. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] who is now absent from the Senate under direction of the body is opposed to that provision of the bill, and I do not feel myself at liberty to ask the Senate to consider it in his absence, knowing his opposition to it; but in agreeing that the bill be passed over on the Calendar I notify the Senate that on his return I shall ask that the bill be taken up and acted upon, because it is an important bill in both of the aspects it presents. I now ask that it be passed over, in view of the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts, without prejudice.

Mr. VEST. I do not want to be guilty of any discourtesy to any brother Senator, but the question to which the Senator from Arkansas alludes was discussed elaborately in the Senate when we had the Davis bill before us, for I had the honor of offering an amendment then which met the opposition of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM] made an elaborate argument upon it. The amendment to the bill was adopted I think by a majority of eighteen, and it is hardly to be supposed that the Senate of the United States has changed its opinion on as important a question as this or that its opinion could be changed by any argument which could be made by any absent Senator. In view of the importance of the question and its having been discussed heretofore, I think the bill ought to be passed.

Mr. GARLAND. I perfectly agree with everything the Senator from Missouri says. The committee were unanimous except the Senator from Massachusetts. A separate bill was reported before and is reported now, and we only carry out the provision already in the statutes as to district judges; but, knowing the opposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, I thought as there were some new Senators in since the question was up before that it would be well and courteous to him that the Senate pass the bill over informally. It is true as the Senator from Missouri says that by a very significant majority this provision was incorporated in the court of appeals bill, as it was called, presented by the late Senator from Illinois, Judge Davis.

Under all the circumstances I prefer that in the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts the bill should go over, and I will call it up when he returns.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the bill being passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar? The Chair hears none. The next bill will be reported.

COURT TERMS IN TEXAS.

The bill (S. 802) to fix and render certain the terms of the United States circuit and district courts in the eastern and northern districts of Texas was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect from and after the 1st day of July next.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIGHTS OF CITIZENS.

The next bill in order was the bill (S. 15) to provide for the further protection of citizens of the United States and others against the violation of certain rights secured to them by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. GARLAND. Without waiting for the reading of that bill, I will state that it will excite considerable debate when it comes before the Senate. I am as ready to consider it now as at any time; but the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] who reported it is absent, and I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is objected to, and goes over under the rule.

MARITIME LIENS.

The bill (S. 415) regulating maritime liens and remedies and to secure uniformity in the enforcement of the rights of material-men in courts of admiralty, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That bill has been reported adversely, and I object to its consideration.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM] who introduced that bill is absent. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over under the rule.

ALONZO GESNER.

The bill (S. 265) for the relief of Alonzo Gesner was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to approve for payment, if on examination he finds the surveys were made in accordance with the report and approval of the surveyor-general of the State of Oregon of date December 1, 1877, certain surveys of the public lands made by Deputy Surveyor Alonzo Gesner, amounting to fifty-four miles and three and nine hundredths chains of township-lines, and three hundred miles and sixty-one and ninety-two hundredths chains of section-lines, at the rate of $7 per mile for township and $6 per mile for section-lines, amounting in all to $2,182.91.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNIVERSITY OF ALABAMA.

The bill (S. 503) to increase the endowment of the University of Alabama from the public lands in said State was announced as next in order.

Mr. PUGH. I ask that that bill be passed over without losing its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the bill being passed over without prejudice? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORGAN subsequently said: A bill was passed over in my absence from the Senate Chamber. Will that bill retain its place on the Calendar for to-morrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can call it up now if he desires.

Mr. MORGAN. I prefer to call it up to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can have that arrangement made by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 503) to increase the endowment of the University of Alabama from the public lands in said State, which was passed over without prejudice, may be called up to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that order will be made. The Chair hears none.

TIMBER ON MENOMONEE LANDS.

The bill (S. 460) to authorize the sale of timber on certain lands reserved for the use of the Menomonee tribe of Indians, in the State of Wisconsin, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARLAND. That seems to be a long bill, and the Senator who reported it [Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin] is absent.

Mr. DAWES. I hardly think there can be the slightest objection to the bill. It seems to be very necessary.

Mr. GARLAND. I have no objection myself, but I saw that the Senator reporting it was absent.

Mr. DAWES. If it involves any debate, of course it can go over, but the committee examined the matter fully.

Mr. GARLAND. Very well.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, January 22, 1884:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 460) to authorize the sale of timber on certain lands reserved for the use of the Menomonee tribe of Indians in the State of Wisconsin, have considered the same, and report thereon as follows:

The remnant of the Menomonee tribe of Indians are located on a reservation situate in Shawano County, in the State of Wisconsin. The reservation is surrounded by timber lands, which are rapidly being settled upon. A portion of the reservation is covered with valuable pine timber. The reservation has been surveyed into allotments, and many of these allotments have been settled upon by Indians. They have been partly cleared, and are cultivated to some extent by the Indians. Fires from outside the reservation and fires that originated on the reservation are injuring the pine timber year by year. It is estimated that at least one-quarter of all the pine on the reservation has been destroyed by fires during the last five years, and it is only a question of time when the whole of it will be destroyed unless it can be cut and utilized soon.

This bill proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to have the timber on the reservation appraised by two or more disinterested appraisers in eighty-acre lots. It also provides that this appraisal shall be filed in the land office at Menasha, Wis., that being the land district in which the reservation is situate, and that such appraisal shall be open for public inspection for at least sixty days before the time appointed for the sale of the timber; also, that one copy of such appraisal shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior.

The bill further provides that the sale of the timber shall be advertised for not less than two months in three newspapers having general circulation in the State. The bill also authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, if he deems it for the best interests of the Indians, to employ the Indians to cut the timber and haul the same to the bank of the rivers; that after the timber is so cut by the Indians it shall be advertised, and, after due notice, sold to the highest bidder, at such time and place as the Secretary of the Interior may designate.

If the logs can not be sold for a price which the Secretary of the Interior deems adequate, he is then authorized to cause them to be run down the rivers to market and sold in the manner he deems best for the interest of the Indians.

It is estimated that the amount of pine now on the reservation is about 150,000,000 feet, and that it would sell, standing in the tree, at $5 a thousand. This would amount to $750,000. The bill provides for an appropriation of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the expense of survey and appraisal, which sum shall be reimbursed to the Treasury from the proceeds of the first sale of timber, and the residue of said proceeds shall be paid to or funded for the benefit of said tribe, in such manner as the President, with the assent of the chiefs and headmen of said tribe, may determine. The number of Indians now on the reservation, as appears by the last report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, is 1,500.

The committee are of the opinion that it would be for the interest of the Indians that the timber be sold and the proceeds invested for their benefit as provided in the bill, and therefore report back the bill with amendments, and recommend that it do pass as amended.

Amend as follows:

In line 14, section 1, and following, strike out the words "and shall be made with the express understanding that the tops and refuse of the timber to be cut shall be reserved for the sole use and benefit of the said Menomonee Indians."

In line 6, section 2, strike out the words "within the Green Bay agency."

In lines 11 and 12, section 2, strike out the words "and the tops and refuse of the timber."

In line 18, section 2, strike out the words "within the Green Bay agency."

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 14, after the word "butt," to strike out the words "and shall be made with the express understanding that the tops and refuse of the timber to be cut shall be reserved for the sole use and benefit of the said Menomonee Indians."

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts, who understands this matter, why it is that this reservation is stricken out? Why ought not the Indians to have that refuse?

Mr. DAWES. This bill passed the Senate last year in precisely the shape it is now reported, with the exception of this amendment. It was thought in committee that this provision of the bill was not only useless to the Indian, would be of no practical benefit to him, but that it would be a temptation to go in and by means of this material kindle fires and destroy timber. It was the belief of the committee that it would not be of any practical benefit to the Indian, and all the lumbermen who propose to purchase timber under the restrictions of this bill advised us that it was not only useless to the Indian but rather deleterious and dangerous. That was the reason the clause was stricken out. The committee had not a particle of choice about it. They put it in last year, but through the advice of the Senators from Wisconsin and those who are acquainted with the lumber business it is now stricken out.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 3, after the word "newspapers," to strike out "of the said district" and insert "published in the State of Wisconsin and;" and in line 5, after the word "circulation," to insert "in said State;" in line 7, after "Interior," to strike out "within the Green Bay agency;" in line 12, after the word "butt," to strike out "and the tops and refuse of the timber are" and insert "is;" and in line 19, after "Interior," to strike out "within the Green Bay agency;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the timber appraised as aforesaid shall be advertised for sale by notice of not less than two months, to be published in at least three newspapers published in the State of Wisconsin and having general circulation in said State, and shall be offered at public auction, at such suitable place as may be designated by the Secretary of the Interior, to the highest bidder, in lots of not exceeding eighty acres, but shall not be sold for less than the appraised value thereof. Said notice shall state, and the timber be offered for sale with the express understanding that growing timber of less than twelve inches in diameter at the butt is not to be included in the sale. All of said timber remaining unsold at the expiration of one year after it shall have been offered as aforesaid may, if the Secretary of the Interior shall deem it for the best interests of the Indians, be again advertised and offered at public auction, at such suitable place as may be designated by the Secretary of the Interior, at not less than the appraised value thereof, and shall in all cases be sold for cash only. The Secretary of the Interior may give such time for the removal of said timber as in his judgment seems proper, not exceeding ten years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOUTHERN UTE INDIANS.

The bill (S. 242) to provide agricultural lands for the Southern Band of Ute Indians in lieu of lands heretofore provided for allotment to them was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALLY MALLORY.

The bill (S. 1056) granting an increase of pension to Sally Mallory was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sally Mallory, widow of B. Mallory, late a soldier in the Revolutionary war and the war of 1812, and to pay her a pension hereafter at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let the report be read.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know some reason for that; let the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. VAN WYCK January 22, 1884:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred Senate bill granting a pension to Sally Mallory, have examined the same, and report:

That Sally Mallory has been for many years, and is now, on the pension-list, receiving $8 per month, as widow of Benajah Mallory, a soldier in the Revolutionary war, in which he served three years; that he also served during the war of 1812, and was under Harrison at Lundy's Lane. She is now over ninety years of age, and has been for a long time supported by an adopted son, who is over seventy years of age, and has in fact not the means to furnish her such support as her age requires. Your committee therefore recommend the passage of Senate bill No. 1056.

Mr. PLATT. I dislike very much to oppose the passage of any bill which has been reported by the Committee on Pensions; but if I understand this bill, it is inaugurating a new practice in Congress, and I think it ought not to pass—certainly not until it is fully explained, and until we are informed whether we are to increase the pensions of all widows who are needy.

For one, I think if there is to be any general increase in any of the pensions which are granted, it ought to apply to the widows of soldiers who were killed in the recent war or who died from wounds received or disease contracted in the recent war. I know of no pension so inadequate to the support of the person receiving it as the $8 per month which is given to the widows of private soldiers. Here is a bill which proposes to pension the widow of one soldier at $30 per month. Unless some very good grounds can be shown why this widow should be thus favored when all the other widows of private soldiers are only receiving $8 per month, I should hardly be prepared to favor the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know from the Senator reporting this bill what reasons there are for the passage of this bill giving this lady $30 a month that would not apply to any old lady. This lady it seems is ninety-odd years old; and it is proposed to give her $30 a month. It is a question of pure sympathy, and there is neither justice nor right in it. It is a gross injustice and wrong to thousands and thousands of widows and orphans in this country. It is a discrimination against thousands and thousands of persons more destitute and needy than this person. It is simply a case gotten up of sympathy. We have been appealed to here to grant this pension perchance because this lady is ninety years old. There are to-day 10,000 widows in the United States more destitute and more needy than this one, and many of them are only receiving $8 a month, while this one is to get $30 a month; quite as much as an able-bodied man working in the Senator's State gets for his wages, and upon that he has to support his wife and children.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 1155) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations.

MESSENGER FOR COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. LOGAN. Before that bill is taken up I ask unanimous consent that we act upon the resolution which I now offer:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to appoint a messenger for the Committee on Military Affairs, whose services shall be devoted exclusively to the business of said committee, and that the messenger so appointed shall be selected by said committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest that similar resolutions offered hitherto have gone to the Committee on Contingent Expenses under the rule. That order will be made in this case if there is no objection.

Mr. PLATT. I think there are several committees that ought to have special messengers; but it is a matter to be considered.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to the reference. I only state that the reason I offer the resolution is that the Committee on Military Affairs in the number of bills has many more than other committees. We have no messenger, and one has to be detailed from the labor-list, which makes it very inconvenient. We should like to have one whom we can rely upon at all times. That is the reason I offer the resolution. I have no objection to its going to the Contingent Expenses Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1155) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. PLUMB to insert, as an additional section, the following:

SEC. 2. That whenever the circulation of any national bank, or any portion thereof, shall be surrendered, the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon issue an equivalent amount of Treasury notes of the denominations now provided by law for national-bank notes. Said Treasury notes shall be deposited in the Treasury and paid out as other moneys kept for the discharge of the obligations of the Government. They shall be receivable for salaries and for all dues to the Government, including duties on imports; shall be a legal tender between national banks and for all debts due to any national bank; shall be redeemable in coin, as the legal-tender notes of the United States now are; and when received into the Treasury they shall be reissued, and when mutilated or worn they shall be replaced in the same manner as now provided by law for said legal-tender notes. The coin held in the Treasury at the date of the passage of this act for the redemption of the legal-tender notes of the Government shall also be applicable to the redemption of the Treasury notes herein provided for; and such coin reserve may from time to time be increased by adding thereto other sums from payments made into the Treasury, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That the total amount of said coin reserve shall never be less than 25 per cent. nor more than 30 per cent. of the total amount of legal-tender and Treasury notes outstanding.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement of the reasons that influence my vote for the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. If that amendment fails I shall vote for the bill of the committee as an experiment, which is not likely to amount to more than a temporary expedient. No country in the world can boast a better currency than the United States. The present volume of circulation is made up of $346,681,016 in legal-tender greenbacks and $348,925,009 in national-bank notes, and silver certificates $110,137,051, and gold certificates $101,250,620, amounting in the aggregate to a fraction under $1,000,000,000. This volume of paper currency is supplemented and supported, in round numbers, by about $400,000,000 in gold and silver. It possesses all the valuable qualities of a well-adjusted and mixed currency. It is made up of elements approaching equality in amount, in uniformity, and public confidence, and constitutes an admirable system of checks and balances.

We are in full view of the dangers of contraction, and it is conceded to be the imperative duty of Congress to make immediate provision against this impending evil. Two hundred and one million of the national-bank circulation is founded on 3 per cent. bonds now payable at the option of the Government. If the surplus revenue derived from taxation is not to be reduced to the wants of the Government it is manifest the national-bank circulation must be reduced over two hundred millions in about two years. The experienced financier the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] estimates that the contraction may amount to $2,000,000 per week, and with reasonable certainty to $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 per annum. Such a sudden contraction of our paper circulation would necessarily produce serious and widespread derangements in our business relations and industrial pursuits.

How shall these dangers of contraction be averted? There are four remedies before the Senate. The bill of the Finance Committee; the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]; the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], known as the Buckner amendment, not unlike the Plumb amendment in substance; the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], and the substitute of my colleague [Mr. MORGAN]. I shall only deal with the bill of the committee and the amendment thereto of the Senator from Kansas.

The merits of the committee bill have been clearly and forcibly presented by Senators BECK, BAYARD, and MCPHERSON. The substance of the committee bill is an increase of 10 per cent. in the amount of circulation to which the national banks are now entitled upon their bonds deposited in the Treasury as a security for their notes. This increase of 10 per cent. it is expected will be a sufficient inducement to the national banks to purchase the 4 and 4½ percents at the present high premium and substitute them for the 3 percents as fast as they may be called by the Government.

It is admitted that there are two dangers of contraction. One from the payment of the 3 percents, and the other from the withdrawal of the 4 and 4½ percents by the banks to enable them to realize the high premium at which they are now selling in the market. The success of the committee bill depends entirely upon the sufficiency of the inducement in the way of greater profits to the banks offered to them by the additional 10 per cent. of circulation. Can there be any well-founded expectation that the effect claimed by its supporters will follow the passage of the committee bill? I understand it to be a fact that the banks are now four millions short of the circulation to which they are entitled on the deposited bonds. With the greater profits of circulation in the past, and an issue short of what the banks had a right to make it, is it likely that 10 per cent. increase in the amount of circulation is to operate as a greater inducement to increase or even to preserve the present volume in the future, when the profits of the circulation are less than in the past? I feel constrained to answer this question in the negative. Then again, if the passage of the committee bill has the effect predicted, of appreciating the market value of the bonds, all the inducement founded on the additional 10 per cent. will be neutralized by such appreciation; so that I am unable to believe that the committee bill can amount to much more than a harmless but disappointing experiment.

In the Plumb amendment there is substance and permanent vital force and effect. It is not founded in hostility to the national banks. It aims at nothing more than what every Senator desires to accomplish, and it will do that much with absolute certainty; and that is to prevent any contraction at any time in the future by the withdrawal of the present volume of currency of national-bank circulation. This great public benefit is permanently secured by making Treasury notes take the place of national-bank notes as fast as the 3 percents are called and paid or the 4 and 4½ percents are withdrawn for sale in the market to get the benefit of the high premium. One great merit of the Plumb amendment I have not heard mentioned, and that is the effect it is likely to have as a restraint upon the national banks in desiring a contraction of their circulation, knowing as they must that under the operation of the Plumb amendment whenever they give up their circulation it is gone forever, with no compensating benefits accruing to them from contraction of the currency. And another very favorable view to take of it is that it does not take the place of the committee bill, but only supplements it with a guarantee that if the national banks refuse to preserve their present volume of circulation under the inducements offered them in the committee bill, then, and not till then, does the Plumb amendment operate to save the people and the country from the ruinous evils of contraction. The committee bill with the Plumb amendment leaves the country with a uniform, stable, and universally accredited currency, and the certainty of a gradual and healthful increase in the volume of circulation from gold and silver certificates.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I will occupy the time of the Senate but a few minutes, my purpose being simply to make a brief statement of the reasons for the votes I have given and shall give on the pending bill and the various amendments proposed. I have on more than one occasion elaborated on the floor of the Senate my views on the national banking system, and my opinions on this subject, which have undergone no change, are well known to all who feel any interest in them. All the amendments offered to the bill reported by the committee, except those offered respectively by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], both of which I cordially approve, being, like the bill itself, in the interest of the national banks, I have neither vote nor favor to bestow upon them or either of them.

Believing as I do that the national banking system, whatever may have been its merits when first inaugurated as a war measure, when the Government was compelled to create a market for its bonds, like many other war measures, has outlived its usefulness and is under the changed conditions now surrounding the country essentially vicious, I can not and will not give my assent to any scheme intended, as this bill and the amendments referred to evidently are, to prop and bolster it up. The rapid extinction of the national debt, with which the national banks came into existence, and upon which they are based and built, and without which as banks of issue they must cease to exist, unless we intend to perpetuate the public debt for the benefit of the banks, makes it necessary that we shall legislate with the view of substituting some other for the national-bank currency.

The amendments proposed by the Senators from Kansas and Missouri have that object in view and provide for the issuance of Treasury notes to take the place of the national-bank notes as they are retired. I believe it wise for many reasons to make this provision, not the least among them being to indicate unmistakably that the traditional sentiment of opposition among the American people to the existence of a great public debt is not to be violated, in the success of a plan openly and boldly avowed of perpetuating that debt in order that the national banking system may be preserved. That such plan has been matured and will be pressed with the hope of consummation there is no question. I opposed the recharter of the national banks when that subject was before the Senate, and gave my reasons at length. I believed then, as I do now, that a struggle for the perpetuation of the national debt would be an inevitable consequence of the passage of that act, that the lease of life and power then extended to that system would so intrench it as to make its dislodgement at any time in the future if not impracticable at least extremely difficult.

It was easy to see then that the argument so much relied on in defense of that system, that the business interests of the country would be disturbed, unsettled, and depressed by any interference with it, although refuted in the clearest and most conclusive manner, would at any future time when these banks had increased in number and influence and business connections again be urged with increased force and earnestness and plausibility, and that every year of their continued existence would add to its apparent strength. I was not able to see then, as I am not now, that the substitution of Treasury notes and gold and silver certificates for national-bank notes as they are retired would unsettle or disturb business in the face of the admitted fact that the uniformity, certainty, and stability of the national-bank note is derived solely from the guarantee and indorsement of the same Government which would issue and be responsible for the substituted currency. Nor have I been able to appreciate the encomiums lavished upon national banks when the perpetuation of an interest-bearing national debt is an absolute condition precedent to their continued existence, while a currency equally sound, stable, and uniform with the national-bank currency can be furnished by the Government in payment of that debt, thus removing the burden of interest from the shoulders of the people at the same time that it resumes its own sovereign function, which should never be delegated, of furnishing a circulating medium for the country.

Why private bankers, upon a capital of gold and silver coin and gold and silver certificates and Treasury notes convertible at will into coin, could not do the business of the country in discount and exchange and supply the people with money facilities as well as it is done on national-bank notes by the national banks, it would puzzle any of the advocates of the banks to explain. National banks add nothing to the circulation unless their bonds are bought in the locality where they are established, which is rarely the case in the South and many portions of the West, where Government bonds are not to be found. The actual money must be taken out of circulation in such localities and sent off to New York usually to buy bonds. Ninety per cent. of these bonds only is issued to the bank in currency, and the redemption fund of 5 per cent. and the reserve fund of 15 per cent. must come out of that, so that the money restored to circulation in that locality by the issuance of the bank notes does not equal the amount sent off to purchase bonds by 30 per cent. Under a system of private banking the entire amount invested in bonds under this system would remain in the locality in circulation. The popular idea that these banks cause money to be more abundant is fallacious, as these facts show, except in the money centers, where the redemption and reserve funds are kept, which are the places where the bonds are usually bought. The national banking system thus depletes the localities where circulation is already scarce, and concentrates the capital of the country in a few great centers.

National banks are in no sense the agents or trustees of the Government. There is no trust relation between them and the people. No obligation rests upon them to care for the public interests. The capital in them is the money of the individual stockholders, who have associated together for the sole purpose of making for themselves all the profit possible in the banking business. They contract or expand the volume of their circulation at will and according to the dictates of their own interests. The policy of placing in the hands of these institutions the regulation and control of the circulating medium of the country, when confessedly managed for the private gain of the comparatively few persons interested in them, is to my mind a most pernicious one. We have been warned by too many instances where these banks because their bonds had reached a high premium in the market have sold them and retired their circulation, utterly regardless of the effect of the contraction on the public interests, to plead ignorance of the fact that these are private money-making institutions and that the interests of the general public are unhesitatingly sacrificed whenever they conflict with those of the individual stockholders.

It has been asserted in this debate that in certain contingencies the premium on some classes of Government bonds are likely to rise higher, offering inducements to the banks to withdraw their circulation and sell their bonds. The amendments of the Senator from Kansas and of the Senator from Missouri, or either of them, would render this action of the banks harmless, and cut off their power to affect the volume of circulation by providing the absolutely certain remedy of requiring Treasury notes issued to take the place of all retired national-bank notes. The great danger now is, and the one sought to be provided against by this bill, that contraction of the currency will ensue from the continued application of the surplus in the Treasury to the payment of bonds in the hands of the banks and pledged by them as security for circulation, thereby necessitating a withdrawal of their notes. We have been warned by the Comptroller of the Currency and the Secretary of the Treasury that we may expect a contraction of sixty millions annually from this cause unless counteracted by prompt remedial legislation. Will this bill as reported from the committee meet the emergency and avert the danger? This is a great question, upon which much depends.

Between eighty and one hundred millions of surplus revenue is being annually wrung from the people by high protective-tariff taxation, which, taken from the arteries of trade and commerce, if permitted to lie idle in the vaults of the Treasury, is ruinous contraction. If used for the payment of the public debt, as it should be and as it is required to be by law, the national banks are deprived of the bonds on which their circulation is based, and their currency must be withdrawn and retired. We seem to be between the upper and the nether millstone, and the question is, will this bill extricate us from the peril? A majority of the Finance Committee believe it will. The minority, embracing such distinguished financiers as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], evidently believe it will not, if we may judge their opinions by the amendments they have proposed to the bill. Who shall determine when these great doctors of finance differ so radically among themselves as to the probable effects of this bill? The danger threatening the country is certain, direct, and inevitable. Doubtful, speculative, or experimental remedies do not come up to the requirements of the occasion.

I have before me the printed circular letter referred to in this debate by the Senator from Kansas, written by the president of the Mercantile National Bank of the city of New York, one of the great moneyed institutions of that great city, protesting against the passage of the pending bill. He says: "As I understand it, the aim of the bill is to prevent a contraction of the currency. With that for its object, I beg most respectfully to predict for the bill if enacted the most lamentable failure." He then proceeds to give at length the reasons for his opinion. The writer is evidently an expert banker and a man of great intelligence and information. Certainly there is room for grave doubt when so many gentlemen learned in finance deny the efficacy of this bill as a remedy for the evils of an insufficient volume of currency impending over the country. We are legislating for fifty-odd millions of people and their vast interests. The volume of circulating medium is the life-blood of the trade, commerce, and business of these people. A serious diminution of its quantity, like a deterioration of its quality, would produce widespread and most disastrous results. We can not afford to take risks of such disaster in the adoption of doubtful remedies when absolute certainty of safety against it is attainable.

The adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas or that of the Senator from Missouri would exclude all risk of further contraction. For every national-bank note retired we would have issued a Treasury note, redeemable at the will of the holder in coin. This would be a practical, certain, and easy solution of the whole trouble and one of assured safety. It would not be a temporary but a permanent settlement of the currency question. The payment of Government bonds could then go on without any other than a feeling of gratification that the debt was being extinguished, instead of the alarm that fact now excites among business men. The process of substituting a new currency would proceed noiselessly, gradually, and without shock or friction, and when the last bank note would be retired its place would be promptly taken by a Treasury note, and we would have a safe, uniform, sound paper currency, issued and guaranteed by the Government, and every dollar of it redeemable at the will of the holder in gold and silver coin. The coin reserve held by the Government to make good its guarantee of national-bank notes would perform the same office for the substituted Treasury notes.

But those who, ignoring the fact that the public debt on which the national banks are bottomed is rapidly disappearing, still cling to that system, and insist on legislating with reference to it as if it was a fixed and permanent institution, object to this mode of settling the difficulty because it is not done through the agency of their pet banking system and would be an acknowledgment that the country can get along well without it. I prefer and believe it wise to look all the facts of the situation squarely in the face, to admit that our present banking system is temporary, and legislate with the view of substituting another gradually in its place so that the country may feel at rest as to the subject.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, recognizing the fact that I am in a hopeless minority here in regard to the national banking system, I shall endeavor only to state my individual opinion in regard to the bill reported by the Committee on Finance and the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

I recognize the fact that the protected manufacturers of the country, the railroad corporations, and the national banks virtually own the property of fifty millions of people.

The original intention of the men who made the national banking system was that it should be perpetual. It has been attributed to Salmon P. Chase, the great Secretary of the Treasury. Recent developments have shown that he was simply an imitator and a copyist, and that the idea on which this system was based came from the fertile brain of Hon. O. B. Potter, who, in a circular which I suppose is on the desk of each member of the Senate, says he submitted this plan for a national currency in 1861 to the then Secretary of the Treasury, and thus he is the father of the system as it has existed ever since. Assuming this to be the fact, from his letter which I hold in my hand I take the liberty of quoting the last sentence:

> A permanent national debt of sufficient amount for these purposes, which is a bond of union, a guarantee for peace, and a daily convenience and blessing to all, will have no terrors for a people whose interests have been the sport of fluctuations in exchange as ours have for the last ten years.

The originator of this system then started out for a perpetual national debt, and the only reason to-day why the friends of the national banks have abandoned that idea is that the overwhelming public opinion of the country has appalled and terrorized them and caused them to quit it. I recollect that in 1881, when we offered the national banks a 3 per cent. thirty-year bond, they took the Government by the throat, retired eighteen millions of currency in one day in the city of New York, crushed down the industries and interests of the country, and my distinguished friend from New Jersey in front of me [Mr. MCPHERSON] stood here and eulogized the national banks as the great benefactors of the country, as the agencies that had preserved the national life, as the instrumentality under God to which the American people should sing pæans of praise for all time to come.

The national banks to-day, instead of asking for a perpetual debt, are tiding over the obstructions which are placed in their way by the bonds of the country becoming due, until twenty-three years from now, as indicated by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], our children will take charge of them and see that they exist henceforth and forever.

For the present the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from New Jersey are simply meeting the little obstacles that are in the way of the national banks and tiding matters over till hereafter, when the last dollar of the national debt shall be paid, and the ingenuity of some financier will find means to fasten this national-bank system upon the people for all time to come.

Mr. President, with my views of the theory of this Government and the powers of Congress, I can not vote for the bill reported by the Committee on Finance. I said in 1881, and I repeat here to-day, that I will never vote for any measure which gives to any corporation the right to control the currency of this country, and experience shows that giving any such power is most dangerous and disastrous.

What are these national banks, that any one who opens his mouth against them is called a communist? I adhere to the judgment of the greatest statesman of this continent, Thomas Jefferson. I am not afraid of the senseless clamor that I am opposed to the capital and the industries of the United States. Chief-Justice Marshall, in the great case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, declared that a national bank could only exist as a financial agent of the Government; that Congress had no right under the Constitution to make a bank for purposes of private speculation or private profit. These banks exist as the financial agents of the Government. In theory their interests are identical with ours. In theory the national banks are simply the hands which the brain of Congress uses for financial purposes. But what is the truth? To-day the national banks are greater than the Government; to-day the only question on this floor is how to seduce and induce the national banks to continue in existence in order to take the money of the people. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that they have increased in number to 2,522 banks; yet I very well remember in the debate of 1881 the Senator from Ohio told us that they were then upon the very verge of dissolution. He told us then that they were barely able to exist. The Secretary of the Treasury tells us that in the last year they have increased more rapidly than in any year since 1865. They have a surplus of over $100,000,000; they have a deposit of over $1,000,000,000. They are able to-day to strike down the industries and energies of this country absolutely and completely.

In 1881 when we offered them 3 per cent. bonds they took the Government by the throat, and in 1870 when their special champion and defender, the Senator from Ohio, offered them a 4 per cent. bond and a 4½ per cent. bond, and begged them in the most dulcet and seductive tones to assist in funding the public debt of the country, what did they do? They refused the bill, they spurned the offer. They said we will prostrate the credit of this country and put it out of existence if you dare put such bonds upon us. Then the Senator from Ohio did not talk as he does now. Oh, no! The change that came over Saul of Tarsus was not more remarkable than that which has come over the distinguished Senator. When his bill had passed the Senate and was defeated in the House of Representatives, here is what the Senator said:

I wish now to record my deliberate judgment that in this conclusion—

The defeat of the bill—

to which we have been compelled to arrive by the action of the House we are doing the national banks a great injury, which will impair their influence and power among the people, and that the opposition of the national banks to this provision, which would have required them to aid in the funding of the public debt, will tend more to weaken and destroy them than anything that has transpired since their organization. I do not see how we can go before the people of the United States and ask them to lend us gold at par for our bonds when we refuse to require agencies of our own creation to take them; when we even refuse to require new banks not yet organized to take these new bonds, and when we refuse to require old banks, which have made on an average from 15 to 20 per cent. annually upon the franchise derived from the United States, to aid us to this extent in funding the national debt.

But, sir, the vote of this House shows the power of the national banks. It is so great, at least in the House, that in order to secure a funding bill we have been compelled to abandon all provisions in regard to the national banks; but I give notice that in the future I for one shall be prepared at all times to require the national banks to take that class of bonds which we propose in this bill, and I have no doubt this will be the result. But for the present, in deference to the wishes of the House, we have withdrawn the section in regard to national banks.

That was as far back as 1870. They then came into the Halls of Congress and defeated the bill before the representatives of the people. They were able then to strike down the offer of 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds, and in 1881, when they had doubled in number and in power and in capital, when we passed the Carlisle amendment proposing to them a 3 per cent. bond running thirty years, it is not necessary for me to repeat the disgraceful history of that legislation. The national banks clamored around the White House until the President was compelled in deference to their wishes to veto that bill, and in less than eight months the same bonds were funded at 3½ per cent., and every financier in the country knows that a 3 per cent. bond would then have been cheerfully accepted by the banks. And now in 1884, when the 3 percents become due, we are again entreating them for mercy. I said they were then the masters of Congress, and they are. Like the daughters of the horse-leech, it is "Give! give! give!" They are never satisfied; they never will be satisfied. They propose to absorb the capital of the country and to dominate all its interests.

Why, Mr. President, what have we done for these agencies of ours? We have enabled them to pile up a surplus of more than $100,000,000 besides the dividends declared to their stockholders; we have rechartered them; we have taken off $5,000,000 of taxes from them; we have extended the time in which they can pay their lost notes from six months to three years; and when the 3 percents are to be paid, they come before Congress and ask that the tax on their circulation of $3,000,000 be removed. That is the meaning of it. In the circular alluded to by the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Kansas I want to call attention to this language of the president of the Mercantile National Bank of the city of New York, with a copy of Mr. POTTER'S bill annexed to it. Here is the gist of it, and I know what the friends of the national banks will do; I know what they have done in the past.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. PLUMB. Is he advised of the present politics of the gentleman who signs that circular?

Mr. VEST. No, sir; and I do not know or care. There is no politics in this question. Here is my friend in front of me [Mr. MCPHERSON] who is standing with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]; here is the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] reporting this bill. Worse than all, my distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] delivered his speech here the other day which I heard with absolute delight. In his argument upon the national banks he said that theoretically they were financial agents of the Government, but in truth they were the agents of their stockholders, and he struck them down in every direction until with "most lame and impotent conclusion" he declared in dulcet tones that he intended to support the bill reported by the Finance Committee.

I know what the combined influence of the national banks will do. You will take the tax off circulation, and whatever they ask will be done. Why, Mr. President, this modest gentleman—I do not know what his politics are and I do not care—says:

This bill, with all others so far offered in the Senate—

Speaking of the McPherson bill—have aimed to attract the national banks—

Mark you, these are our agents, our servants, living by our permission, presumed to be identified in interest with us; and we are to ask them, we are to seduce them, we are to give them bounties in order to keep them from putting their hands to our throats and crushing out the interests of the people. To ask the national banks—now pledging 3 per cent. bonds to replace them, as called, by purchase of these 4 percents or 4½ percents. It is the 3 per cent. holding national bank, therefore, that must be served at this crisis if the public welfare is to be considered in this fear of currency contraction.

If you want to consult the welfare of the people you have got to satisfy us!

He also says:

Further to sustain this point the following from the New York Times of to-day (February 14) is in point: "Unless this (tax on circulation) be removed it is quite idle to talk of inducing the banks to replace their 3 per cent. bonds by 4 per cent. bonds, with the privilege of circulation up to par."

Now, I undertake to say that the tax on circulation will be removed. You have taken off the tax on deposits, you have given them three years instead of six months to pay their lost notes; and still they are not satisfied. They want the tax off the circulation, and you will take it off. You will do it as obediently as ever a slave obeyed the command of his master. You do not dare to refuse them. They will carry any bill that they choose to offer in the Halls of Congress.

Mr. President, let us see their situation to day, as shown by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury:

The number of national banks in operation November 1, 1883, was 2,522, an increase over all former years. The number of banks organized during the year is 261, the greatest number organized during any year since 1865. They exist in every State and organized Territory of the Union. The capital of the newly organized banks is $28,654,350, and the circulation $7,909,150, which is about one-fourth of the capital, showing that the banks have taken advantage of section 8 of the act of July 12, 1882, which authorizes banks of $150,000 capital and under to be organized upon the deposit of bonds to the amount of one-fourth of the capital.

Returns made on October 2 of this year show an aggregate national-bank capital of $509,699,787, an increase of $26,595,574 during the year; a circulation of $314,931,575; a surplus of $102,000,482, and individual deposits of $1,049,437,709, both of which are in decrease; loans of $1,303,450,790, and specie of $107,817,983, both of which are in increase. The corporate existence of 307 has expired during the year, of which 273 have renewed it under the act passed by the last Congress.

* * * * * * *

The national banks hold, as security for circulation, $352,877,300 of United States bonds, a reduction of $9,613,350 during the year.

In other words, these banks have increased more in the last fiscal year than in any year since 1865; still there has been a decrease in circulation of nearly $10,000,000. If we have heard in this debate from the Senators on both sides of the Chamber anything in "damnable iteration," it has been that the financial system of the country should be simple and stable. I want stability in this business; but I want some Senator to point out to me how a system can be stable wherein the circulation fluctuates every year and in accordance with the interests of these national banks.

In 1881 we attempted to repeal that clause in their charters, or the act organizing them, which gives them power to contract or expand the currency at their will. We were defeated in it. The President vetoed the bill; and now, with an increase of the number of national banks, we find the fact to be that the circulation of the country has decreased $10,000,000. In other words, we leave the volume of the currency to the avarice, to the interest, to the expediency of these national banks themselves. I would not give that power to any man or set of men on earth; and, more than all, I would not give it to those whose profession and business it is to accumulate money as the agents of their stockholders.

Mr. President, I have upon my desk, and other Senators have, a pamphlet from Mr. L. E. Chittenden, and he says and proves to my mind conclusively that these bonds as they approach maturity will be enhanced in value. He says in regard to the value of the bonds:

> Those who three years ago said that the fours could never rise above 116, will now claim and prove that they never can rise above 125. They will insist that at that price British consols are a better purchase. I answer by pointing to the facts. The fours will continue to steadily appreciate in price, relatively to the time they have to run, up to the point at which they will not yield over 2 per cent. per annum for their unexpired term if held to maturity, which would be equal to 137.50, with the unexpired term which is now before them; or relatively in proportion as the time of their maturity will then be nearer. There the appreciation may cease, if there is a prospect that a 2 per cent. bond may be issued at par. When they will reach this point I do not know, but it will be long before you need to make any radical changes in the bank system.

I believe that statement is true. I believe as these bonds approach maturity they will be enhanced in value. They will be needed for the different financial necessities of the country, not only as a basis of banking capital, but for trustees, executors, administrators, and the varied uses of the commercial and financial world. Now I ask any Senator to point out to me how that system can give stability when it is the interest of the holders of the bonds continually to retire the bonds and take out their money. If to-day with 4 per cent. bonds at 124 you are engaged here in inducing these banks not to bring in their bonds and take out the currency, what are you to do when they go to 137.50? As you increase the premium on the bonds you increase the temptation of the national banks to put in their bonds, take out the money, and loan it to the people at 10 per cent. Here is the argument which never can be answered. It has not been answered in this debate, and I undertake to say it never will be. Instead of stability you have a system which fluctuates with the market, which fluctuates with the cupidity, the interest, and the avarice of these national banks.

This same gentleman attacks the amendment of the Senator from Kansas and that which I have had the honor to offer, for the principle is the same, the principle being that as the notes are retired by national banks an equivalent amount in Treasury notes without the legal-tender quality of greenbacks, shall be issued by the Government to take the place of the vacuum in the circulation created by the retirement of the national-bank notes. Mr. Chittenden, for whom I have very great respect, makes this argument against these amendments:

> The proposition of your chairman [Mr. BUCKNER] is to replace the bank notes redeemed by Treasury notes. We need not stop to consider the legal, constitutional, or but one practical objection to this plan, for that one objection is insurmountable. These Treasury notes are to be issued in exchange for something, I suppose. For what? We have the 3 percents to give in exchange for them, and for the next seven years we have nothing else. Mr. BUCKNER'S plan would retire the 3 percents with his new Treasury notes, and leave the surplus to accumulate in the Treasury. This would be contraction inevitable, and of the most fatal description.

If that be true, then the Senator from Ohio is justified when he commenced his argument on this bill and against the amendment of the Senator from Kansas and that of myself, with the sweeping assertion that these propositions were entirely too radical and in his opinion did not enter into this argument at all. How is the currency of the country contracted? If contracted, we know how disastrous and fatal will be the effects on the commerce and interests of the whole country. Contraction comes in two ways. In the first place by holding the surplus of revenue in the Treasury, which has been for the past two years more than $100,000,000 annually. If that $100,000,000 per year were hoarded in the Treasury and not put in circulation, it would be a fatal contraction. In the second place, contraction takes place by the national banks retiring their circulation and taking out their bonds. In these two ways contraction is effected and we ought to seek every way to avoid it.

Now, Mr. President, let us look at the operation of this amendment if it should go into effect. Suppose for the sake of the argument that the amendment of the Senator from Kansas or that of myself should prevail, contraction would take place most inevitably if the Treasury notes were kept in the Treasury just as to-day that contraction would take place if the surplus of $100,000,000 a year which comes into the Treasury were kept there.

What relieves the country from this contraction by reason of the surplus? It is the fact that whenever there is $10,000,000 more in the Treasury than the necessities of the Government require the Secretary of the Treasury immediately proceeds to buy the bonds of the Government that are then upon the market, and the men in Wall street understand when these purchases are to be made as well as Mr. Folger, the Secretary of the Treasury. They know the rules of the Treasury Department, and the newspapers in New York infallibly predict when the Secretary of the Treasury proposes to go into the market and buy $10,000,000 in bonds. By the purchase of these bonds the surplus is again put into circulation.

What is there to prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from taking these Treasury notes, which are just as good as the greenbacks—for I agree with the Senator from Ohio that the legal-tender quality of the greenbacks adds nothing to their value—what is to prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from taking those Treasury notes manufactured by him under the amendment of the Senator from Kansas and purchasing the bonds of the Government that are then for sale in open market? Is there anything to prevent it?

Why should the enemies of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas continue to complain as the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] did that these notes can not be paid out of the Treasury? How do you account for it to-day that putting the surplus every year into circulation you thereby prevent the fatal contraction which would otherwise occur? Can it not be done under this amendment as well as it is done now? Do you suppose the Secretary of the Treasury will take the Treasury notes authorized by the amendment and hermetically seal them and put them away? I assume no such thing, and I believe no such thing.

But, Mr. President, we are told that this amendment is a radical measure, and that we must have simplicity and stability. This we have been told here again and again. Sir, it may be my ignorance and absolute idiocy; but if any mortal man will show me that it is more simple for me to indorse another man's note and put it into circulation than to put my own note into circulation I will then believe that the national banking system is absolutely necessary to the financial existence of the people of the United States.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator allow me a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Does he say that the bank note has not anything added to its value derived from the security it has from the capital that is deposited to sustain and redeem the circulation?

Mr. VEST. Why, Mr. President, what is this capital? The capital upon which the bank notes are based is the credit of the Government. That is all.

The Senator from Ohio the other day said that the legal-tender quality did not add a particle to the value of greenback notes, and I agree with him. Who does not know that national bonds when the country was hanging in the balance went down, but when the country was triumphant in war these securities went up? Who does not know that it is the credit of the Government which is the true basis of this whole system? Talk about individual responsibility giving these notes currency all over the country in every State and Territory! What gives it to the greenbacks? Are they not as good as national-bank notes? Will some Senator who is fascinated with the national-bank-note system, and who has eaten the insane root of this question, tell me that a greenback is not as good as a national-bank note? Amid all this phalanx of national-bank warriors is there one who will say there is any individual responsibility behind the greenbacks? Where is it? It is the credit of the Government of the United States; it is the broad seal of the Government imprinted on its face which gives these notes value. Take it away, and what is this money? It is the red-dog and wild-cat currency that the Senator from Kansas spoke of that rests on the individual liability of bankers. As the late Senator from Ohio would say, "that won't do."

You say you want a stable currency. You establish a Bureau of Engraving at a cost of millions of dollars, and to do what? To manufacture these notes to be put in the hands of these favored corporations to be loaned to the people of the United States at 10 per cent. interest. Instead of issuing your own money you put it in the hands of these financial agents, who turn around the very minute you undertake to place the common burden of the country on them and seize the Government by the throat, and you bow down and truckle and kneel to them as subserviently as any slave ever bowed to a master.

But, Mr. President, it is hardly necessary for me to pursue the subject further. We know the inevitable result; we know that the decree has already been made, if not recorded. We know that the national banks will get what they want, and get it upon their own terms. The only scramble in the Senate to-day seems to be who shall do the most for them. The only question is who shall burn the most incense, who shall excel his compeer in praise of these marvelous financial agencies. Weak as we were told they were in 1881, they have increased, by some sort of necromantic process, to 2,522. Their surplus has increased, their capital has increased, their deposits have increased, and to-day they come and deliberately read to you their mandate that you must take off $3,000,000 additional tax upon their circulation, and you will do it.

I said in the beginning of my few remarks that I am willing to be put with communists like Thomas Jefferson, the greatest statesman who ever existed upon this continent. I was struck the other evening with an extract from a letter written to Dr. Josephus B. Stewart from Monticello, May 10, 1817. Then there was but one bank, or but one bank in prospect. The financial system of the United States was in its infancy, and did not have as much capital as a single bank to-day in the city of New York. Yet Jefferson saw what was the tendency of this system, and he wrote these prophetic and marvelous words in the light of subsequent history and subsequent events:

> It is raising up a moneyed aristocracy in our country which has already set the Government at defiance, and although forced at length to yield a little on this first essay of their strength, their principles are unyielded and unyielding. These have taken deep root in the hearts of that class from which our legislators are drawn, and the sop to Cerberus from the fable has become history. Their principles lay hold of the good, their pelf of the bad, and thus those whom the Constitution had placed as guards to its portals are sophisticated or suborned from their duties.

Mr. President, when we look at the marvelous power of these institutions to-day, these words of Jefferson have passed into prophecy. I know how useless it is to repeat them. I know that they do not amount to a nursery tale or a song which lulls to sleep an infant. What do they amount to in the presence of the vast aggregated capital that is present now in these Halls and asking for this legislation? For myself, if it be the last vote that I give in the Senate, I will vote against any bill which takes the highest attribute of sovereignty from the Government itself and puts it in the hands of a lot of bankers to speculate upon the necessities of the people.

This Government, as I understand it, is based upon the principle of equal rights before the law to all and exclusive privileges to none. No privileged class has the right to use any of the attributes of the Government for self-aggrandizement or private gain.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] did me the honor to allude to me a while ago in what he said in regard to this great and important question. I have not made any preparation for the discussion of it, and I do not intend to discuss it at any length; but I think that the observations of that Senator call for some reply. I think when he says that the national banks are here swaying the councils of the country he is saying that which in his calmer moments he would readily retract. I will say for myself at least, if there is a man in this Chamber who knows less about the national banks than another I am that man. I do not think I ever owned a dollar of their stock, and I do not think I ever had a dollar in one of them in my life; and I am able to take, I think, a calmer view of this subject than the Senator who has addressed the Senate with so much animation.

Who control the national banks? Who are the men who direct this system of diversified, not concentrated, power that pervades this great land? They are the fellow-citizens of every Senator on this floor. The banks are diversified over this continent. They differ from the concentrated monster that Mr. Jefferson spoke of, located at a particular place, enjoying bounties and advantages under the Government such as these banks have never enjoyed. In the former the United States was the chief stockholder. In the latter the Government has not a dollar invested.

Every man knows that we must have some system of banking under this Government, unless you intend to constitute a power in the Government that the framers of our Constitution never intended it should have. God knows it has exercised too much power of late. One of the difficulties in our system is that power has been concentrated instead of diversifying itself; and everything that the Senator has said here to-day has been in favor of the concentration of power in this great Government that is overshadowing everything throughout the land by its great central authority.

There is no State or community in this Union to-day that has not a national bank under the control of the citizens of the country, and who have put into it their individual capital, and who employ it to facilitate business wherever it exists. It discounts paper, it affords facilities for deposit, it gives conveniences to the public that no government ever can give unless you intend to convert this Government into a great banking establishment, which its designers never intended it should be. You must have a banking system.

The power of issuing circulation that belongs to the national banks is the great topic of debate. I presume they could exist without it.

I ask the Senator from Missouri if he would be willing to take off the tax of 10 per cent. on the circulation which gives to these banks the monopoly that they enjoy and remit the power of furnishing a currency to the country to the governments of the States, as they had it before these banks came into existence? Who ever heard of anybody calling the State banks before the war monsters? Still there was not a State in this Union that did not have in it a number of banks which issued their notes not as a legal tender, but to furnish the people with currency under the State laws. I am not sure, notwithstanding all that has been said on that subject, but that it would be just as well if that system existed to-day.

There must be some authority in this Government to authorize the issue of paper currency. From the time of the dissolution of the national Bank of the United States up to the creation of the present banks the State banks furnished the paper circulation and the Government was confined to the duty of coining gold and silver coin in accordance with the requisitions of the Constitution. It never was intended, I say with all deference to the Senator from Missouri, that this Government should issue paper money in time of peace or in time of war as a circulation for this people. There cannot be found, in my judgment, any authority in our fundamental law on that subject for issuing purely Government paper.

It was against the opinion of Mr. Jefferson when in Washington's Cabinet that the Government created a great corporation to do this thing, and he resisted it; but it came to be accepted by the country that Congress had that power, and the first Bank of the United States was created and it issued notes until 1811, when its charter expired. That created a diversity of opinion among different parties in the country, but at last the Supreme Court passed upon the question and concluded that it was constitutional to create a national bank. Finally it was made a great political question between parties, and that bank was destroyed, as we know, by the Democratic party, that to which my friend from Missouri and myself belong, in 1836. But that bank was a great monopoly. Its powers and its privileges belonged to a few men, and no others could enjoy them. Its capital was made up largely of the Government's funds. It had charge of the public revenues and disbursed them. There is no resemblance between the existing banks and that of the old Bank of the United States. They are strictly private institutions and have no monopoly whatever. The right to establish a bank now belongs to any one who wishes to put his capital into the business. There is not a dollar of Government money invested in the present banks.

After the fall of the Bank of the United States where did the advocates of paper money say that the power to issue it should reside? Did any considerable number of public men in this country claim for the Government at that time the authority to issue paper money, whether to be a legal-tender or not, after the dissolution of the Bank of the United States? There was not a statesman in the Senate or in the other House under the Constitution which we now have who contended that there was power in this Government to issue notes to take the place of the Bank of the United States which was destroyed by the veto power of Andrew Jackson. The doctrine was that Congress had no power to coin money of paper. It had no power to make anything but gold or silver legal-tender. It is true that interest-bearing notes were issued from time to time, but this was the better to enable the Government to raise money on them, but they were not intended as currency.

After the destruction of the Bank of the United States the power of issuing paper currency was remitted to the States, where it remained until the necessities of war brought into existence the present banking system.

I want to know of the Senator from Missouri if there is any additional power in the Constitution of the United States over this subject that was not there at the time of the dissolution of the Bank of the United States? I am well satisfied after having read the debates on that subject that if the great men who were in favor of dissolving that corporation had conceived any power in this Government to issue paper money in the place of that which had formerly been issued by the great monster that Jackson had destroyed, they would not have hesitated for a moment to have authorized the issuance of paper money in the place of that of the Bank of the United States. But they could not find it. No man can find it to-day, I do not care who he is. There is power there to coin money and regulate its value, but there is no authority in the Constitution for Congress to issue paper money as a medium of circulation for this people. It has been done, and it may be said that that is a sufficient answer.

We know very well the ground upon which a Republican Supreme Court placed it, and the Senator knows the great struggles for reasons that that court had when it came to deal with that question, to try to discover an authority in our fundamental law for the issuance of paper money even in time of war as a legal tender. He knows very well that with all the ingenuity possible that could be brought to bear on this subject (and no case that ever went to that court called forth more learning than that), they had to go to the war power for authority to issue those notes which are now advocated as a permanent circulation in time of peace. To coin money does not mean to print paper.

As a Democrat, standing by the limitation of this great organic law, I do not intend to depart from it, and if authority is to be obtained for this purpose, I say go to the people and to the States with an amendment to the Constitution and ask them to give you power to do this thing.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida if he proposes to vote for the McPherson bill.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That is another thing.

Mr. VEST. I wish to say to the Senator, without interrupting him further, that if he votes for any of the measures coming from the Committee on Finance, he then believes that these banking corporations can have power which the Government has not got; that the Government can give them something which it has not itself.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That is not the question. These bank laws came into existence in time of war, just as the notes that we now find in circulation. I regard the notes of the national banks as the paper of private corporations. I regard them very much in the same light as the paper of the banks of the several States in their day.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator from Florida permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. COKE. Does not the right exist in the Government to place its public debt in the shape of Treasury notes by exchanging Treasury notes for its outstanding interest-bearing bonds?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That is rather a refined question. I am one of those thinkers who believe it is never proper to do by indirection what you can not do directly. I say to the Senator from Texas that if that was intended as a means to furnish a paper money by indirection it could not be done. There is the Constitution, which says what your power shall be, to coin money and regulate the value thereof, and that was the view that was entertained by all the thoughtful men of this Government from the time the Bank of the United States was dissolved to the institution of the existing banks.

Mr. COKE. If the Senator will allow me, did not Mr. Calhoun think that Treasury notes could be issued by the Government?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I remember what Mr. Calhoun said on that subject, but it met with very little favor in this body, even from his political associates. He did at one time make a speech here in which he stated that it would be wise to have a circulation based upon exchequer bills, or something of that kind, but it passed away. Mr. Calhoun at one time advocated a system of revenue for protection very different from that now advocated by my friend from Texas and he afterward changed his opinion. Great men of course at times entertain such eccentric opinions, but it can not be said to have been their settled views.

I say that from the time of the dissolution of the Bank of the United States under Jackson's administration to the institution of the present banking system no considerable number of men in Congress of either party ever claimed for this Government the right to create paper money, whether as a legal tender or currency, and whatever prerogatives might have been claimed by the banks that they created that was a different thing, for such notes are only circulating credit and not paper money.

Let me tell Senators there is a great distinction between paper which circulates merely as credit and Government money proper, that bearing the stamp of the Government, as spoken of by my friend from Missouri a while ago. In his overanxiety to be explicit he confounded distinctions on this question. Those who have given any thought to this subject must know that there is a very great difference between the ordinary bank bill of a corporation which is permitted to circulate as a mere credit and a Government note which goes out to the world without regard to credit, and having nothing behind it but the stamp of the Government itself, having no resources behind it of a definite character to secure its redemption. The bills of the banks now are circulating credits. They are not paper money in any sense. It is like a promissory note of an individual permitted for commercial and business purposes to go from hand to hand. But when you get to the subject of governmental money, that which has deluged Europe at times with a paper circulation, and which in the beginning of our own Revolutionary war brought so much trouble upon this people and against which the wise framers of the organic law attempted to erect a barrier, you are speaking of a different thing. When you speak of the notes of a corporation or of an individual which circulate as money you are speaking of that which has behind it a definite specific security for its redemption, and it is nothing but a mere note of credit of a private party. In the other case you go indiscriminately with the mere stamp of the Government upon a piece of paper and issue it by the millions, beyond the wants of trade, the necessities of commerce, until you deluge the country with an inflated mass of paper which will depreciate our values and destroy our individual rights. That is the system which brought ruin to Austria, to Russia, Turkey, and other weak, unthinking continental powers that have been deluged with it, but against which England had the wisdom and the statesmanship to guard. It is impossible for government to fix a healthy limit to the volume of paper money or to stop its depreciation once it gets on the decrease of value.

I made no preparation for a speech, and I will only say in closing that so far as I am concerned I am not the advocate of any corporation, banking or otherwise, but I do repeat that in my poor opinion it will be an unfortunate day for the best interests of this country when it shall be held that to "coin money" means to print Government paper, and when the wants of commerce and trade with respect to paper circulation shall be determined by the votes of Congress and the volume of our circulation determined by public expenditures.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] represents the principles of the Democratic party, Thomas Hart Benton, who for thirty years was a leader in this body, could not obtain admission to the party at the present time, but would be blackballed if his name were presented.

The Senator from Missouri proposes that the Government shall become a great national banking institution for the purposes of the issue of paper money without any preparation for its redemption. I wish to say that so far as that policy has been adopted by any nation no one has ever redeemed its paper in gold or gold and silver.

I merely rose to correct one or two impressions of the Senator from Missouri in relation to the national banks, about their being the invention of one man, and intended to be a permanent institution of this country. Anybody who will examine the statutes of New York will see that it was merely an adoption of the system of New York. No one, not even Mr. Chase or any one else, can claim a patent-right upon the system of national banks. So far as their permanence is to be considered, they will last as long and no longer than there are bonds that can be deposited for the security of their circulating notes.

Let me say another thing in relation to the position of the banks when there were $18,000,000 withdrawn in a short time. That was because the banks could not make money in the business, and it will be so now and forever. You can not induce men to embark in enterprises where they are sure to make a loss. At that time money was worth more than 3 or 4 per cent., and therefore it was no object to the banks to have that kind of security. Money is more abundant and worth less now, and that changes the condition of things.

Let me say another thing in relation to the statement as to banks generally obtaining 10 per cent. interest upon their loans. I deny it. I do not know of any spot or place in the country where national banks are obtaining 10 per cent. interest when based upon a circulation derived from bonds bearing interest above 3 per cent. It would be obviously against their interest to go into national banking if they could obtain that amount of interest, for the difference between the amount that they would have to pay for their bonds costing a high premium and the amount of interest that they would regain by loaning their money would be more than counterbalanced.

The idea that these banks are oppressive I think is a very gross mistake. There is no portion of our country where they are located that they do not reduce the rate of interest to the people. It follows as a matter of necessity.

I merely rose to refer to these points, and do not desire to retain the floor any longer.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, it becomes my duty to give a vote upon the pending measure, and in doing so I wish to state the reasons which shall govern my own action upon the bill.

We are not discussing a proposition to abolish our present system of banking, or the connection between the banks of the country, the credit institutions of the country, and the national debt. We are confronted with a certain fact, the fact that there is a debt of $1,273,475,450 bearing interest, and an amount in the Treasury of $398,287,581 annually, and $310,517,827 of national-bank notes outstanding.

The amendments before the Senate, the bill reported by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], and the bill introduced by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] are substantially the same. They propose a remedy for a contraction of the currency existing under these circumstances, a national debt of over $1,300,000,000 convertible into currency upon certain conditions and an amount of revenue in the Treasury of nearly $398,287,581 annually. The question for consideration before us is the merits of this plan of relief, this remedy for contraction, and to that I shall endeavor to confine my attention. The question for our consideration is, what is the remedy proposed for the contraction which is admitted upon all sides to exist, and which it is apprehended with very great certainty will exist more largely in the future? The remedy proposed by the several propositions before the Senate is an inducement to deposit bonds and take out circulation.

This inducement is an increased amount of circulation to each bond. It is then a proposition to add a new quality of value to the bond. It is admitted that this contraction results from a high-premium value of the bonds.

The difference between the profit of selling the bond to the Government at a certain high rate of premium and retiring the circulation, and the uncertain profit of keeping the bond and the circulation until the high-premium value of the bond changes, induces the sale of the bond and the surrender of the currency to the Government.

The high-premium value of the bond, therefore, is the cause of contraction. The remedy proposed is to add a new quality of value to the bond.

The remedy for the present high-premium value of the bond under the bill and the amendment, except the amendments of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], is to increase its present high-premium value by adding a new quality of value to it.

Can you make the bond less valuable by making it more valuable by creating a new or more extended use for it, if the contraction proceeds from the difference between the certain profit of realizing a high-premium value and the uncertain profit or the certain less profit of keeping the bond and the currency until the premium disappears?

Can you remedy the evil of contraction proceeding from this cause by letting the cause remain, that is, by increasing the value of the bond and rendering present profit greater and increasing the uncertainty of future profit? Can you remove this cause of contraction in any other way than by making the future profit of retaining the bond and the circulation more certain than the present profit of realizing a high-premium value? Can you accomplish this result in any other way than by reducing the present high-premium value of the bonds which are the basis of circulation? It is admitted in the argument that the high-premium value of the bond is the factor that induces the surrender of the currency.

If you increase that high-premium value you can never remove the certainty of present profit in surrendering the currency, and the uncertainty of future greater profit, or rather the certainty of less future profit, in retaining the bond and retaining the circulation. A certainty of present profit will always prevail as an efficient factor over an uncertainty of the same degree of profit in the future. Much more will a certainty of present profit prevail over a certainty of a future less profit. The present high-premium value of bonds is a certainty. The future disappearance and loss of this premium is an equal certainty. With these two factors remaining you can not by increasing the present value of the bond or adding a new quality of value to it, as these bills and amendments propose to do, or, in other words, by increasing the certainty of present profit, lessen the uncertainty of future profit in retaining the bond and the circulation. Let us examine, then, this admitted and powerful factor in withdrawing the currency, that is, the present high-premium value of the bonds, and endeavor to ascertain whence it comes and on what it depends.

That a bond should be worth from eight to thirty dollars more than it will pay when the period of its payment occurs is not a normal but an abnormal fact.

It is quite certain that no one will give twenty-five or thirty dollars more for it the day before it is to be paid than they will receive for it the next day when it will be paid. It is therefore short-lived, and must diminish and disappear with the approach of the time of payment. What quality of value, then, is it in a bond which induces any one to give a premium for it, say $125, for that which will pay only $100? What advantage can a man with $125 promise himself to induce him to take a Government bond for $100 for his $125?

What is the quality of a bond of the United States that gives it value, and why should it be worth more than it will pay? Its first quality of value is its certainty of payment; its second, its safety from robbery or destruction; its third, its long time, saving trouble in change of investments, and giving certainty to the amount of income to be derived from it; its fourth quality of value is its convertibility at all times into other values. Certainty of payment, safety from destruction, and convertibility.

Now, it will be readily seen that none of these qualities pertain to a premium on the bond. The premium value is no part of the obligation of the Government, not even of the intrinsic value of the bond. The premium, therefore, must depend on some other circumstances.

What are these circumstances that create the premium? Do they give any assurance of stability or permanence? The premium value of the bond must depend upon and be created by the demand for the bond. The natural demand for the bond must arise from its own intrinsic qualities of value affected, or increased or limited by the abundance or scarcity of money, and increased or diminished by the speculative wants of those who deal in bonds, and may be largely influenced by cliques or the efforts of interested parties in putting the premium value up or down.

It must be admitted that it is an unnatural and abnormal condition when the money which is only intended to effect exchanges of property and which in so doing finds ample remuneration is withdrawn from its proper function and invested at low and unprofitable rates in Government securities. One reason for this it will be seen is the fact that a person owning a United States bond not only has the amount of the bond within his control, but he also has the amount of the bond in money within his control, and at all times he can keep his bond and at the same time obtain upon it the use of its face value in money.

This quality of convertibility into money or of obtaining money upon the security at all times makes the bond practically usable as so much money in the hands of the holder, but all of these qualities of value are not sufficient to account for the high-premium value of the bonds when the current rates of interest charged for the use of money is so much greater than that which the bond pays. Obviously there is no hypothesis based on these facts in which it can be to the interest of any one having $100 in money to give it for a bond of $75 when he can use the $100 at a higher rate of interest and for far greater profit than the bond will yield him.

We must search, therefore, for some other cause than the intrinsic qualities or value of the bond for the present high-premium value.

Among the facts which are connected with this subject we find one which attracts attention worthy of thoughtful consideration. It is the fact that the Government is constantly withdrawing from the uses of business and for the purposes of Government an enormous sum of money, amounting annually to about $398,287,581, leaving after all the present objects of appropriation are provided for a surplus of over $100,000,000, or about that sum; and that this vast surplus has by law and by the habit of the Government but one means of getting out of the Treasury and back into the hands of the people for its legitimate purposes, and that is by the purchase of bonds at whatever premium-value shall be demanded for them; that is, that the Government advises the holders of bonds that it will impose an onerous and excessive system of taxation on the people far in advance of the uses of the Government, and expend it in the purchase of the class of bonds bearing the highest rate of interest at whatever premium they may bear. The Government, therefore, is a standing purchaser in the market for bonds at their highest premium rates, and a bidder with one hundred millions a year at its command for their purchase.

Is it possible for this fact to exist without having a material influence in increasing the premium value of the bond? And so long as it exists can you remedy the evil? Can you affect it by adding a new quality of value to the bond other than to increase the evil?

We have, then, excessive taxation yielding a large surplus revenue, and the use of this surplus for the purchase of bonds at high-premium rates, concurring to produce a constant contraction of the currency, a constant withdrawal of the money necessary for the legitimate uses of exchange and commerce.

The simple collection of the vast revenues of the Government and the time it is held before being paid out again continually withdraws a large sum from the business of exchange, and when you add to this the amount of currency retired by surrendering the bonds, and we have the causes of contraction, which it is necessary to remove before you can prevent the inevitable and necessary consequence of contraction. The advantage or disadvantage of the use of the Government credit in the form of Treasury notes as a circulating medium, instead of bonds as the basis of a circulation issued to associations of individuals under the name of banks, is an entirely different subject, resting on different conditions. When issued in whatever form, associations of individuals would accumulate them and make them a basis for other credits, which would perform the functions of money. The advantages of such a system or its disadvantage will have to be considered carefully and well before it can be adopted as a substitute even in part for the existing system.

It has been my purpose only to present the reasons which address themselves to my own mind in regard to the inadequacy of the pending measures of relief to remedy the existing and the future contraction of the currency. I find this train of reasoning which has presented itself to me and these conclusions sustained by the letter of Mr. William P. St. John, president of the Mercantile National Bank of New York, which has been referred to before, and from which I read the following extract:

> As I understand it, the aim of the bill is to prevent a contraction of the currency. With that for its object I beg most respectfully to predict for the bill, if enacted, the most lamentable failure. In evidence of this belief I beg to say that notwithstanding the fact that the 4 per cent. bonds with their twenty-three and a half years of life remaining, if purchased at the average price ruling in the past twelve months as against a purchase of the seven-and-a-half-year 4½ percents at the average price of the same period, would have yielded a return to a national bank on circulation of about 2 per cent. per annum more; yet the general aversion among the banks to a high-premium account is so great that the increase in bank pledge of these bonds, in this period of a year, has been but about one million dollars of these better-paying but high-priced 4 percents, as against an increase of more than seven and a half million dollars of the lower-priced 4½ per cent. bonds; the greater length of the high-priced bonds adding another feature to weigh in their favor if this aversion were to be overcome. This bill, with all others so far offered in the Senate, have aimed to attract the national banks now pledging 3 per cent. bonds to replace them, as called, by purchase of these 4 percents or 4½ percents. It is the 3 per cent. holding national bank, therefore, that must be served at this crisis if the public welfare is to be considered in this fear of currency contraction.
> Further to sustain this point the following from the New York Times of to-day (February 14) is in point:
> "Unless this (tax on circulation) be removed it is quite idle to talk of inducing the banks to replace their 3 per cent. bonds by 4 per cent. bonds with the privilege of circulation up to par."
> But if any of these measures were adopted, and should prove successful, the public will in another way be asked to suffer. At the present rate of Government income and expenditure two and one-half years will serve to exhaust the Government option to call 3 per cent. bonds. Thereafter all unappropriated moneys, unless allowed to accumulate in the Treasury, must be applied to the purchase of outstanding bonds. If meanwhile the banks should be induced to replace their 3 percents. as the result of such enactment, it must appear that you will have legislated out of the market nearly $200,000,000 of bonds and correspondingly enhanced the prices of bonds remaining when the Government must of necessity become a purchaser, and with no option left to bear upon possible clique movement against the Government in the market. How much in the public interest this proceeding would be, when not at all a necessity to prevent the threatened currency contraction, the wise will discover.

Without committing myself to an approval of the specific means suggested, the conclusion addresses itself to my mind with some force, as in the line of the only possible remedy connected with the present form of Government credits and its connection with the circulating medium or with the present system of banking. The true remedy in my judgment is a reduction of taxation to the necessary wants of the Government and a cessation of the purchase of bonds at premium rates; if you can add to this refunding of the national debt at lower rates of interest, or a substitution of a new form of the public credit for currency, this will be a step further. In whatever form the public credit is used for this purpose it will have to be intrusted to associations of credit in some form, and the contraction or expansion of the currency, opening and closing with the tides of production and exchange, will have to be controlled and directed by those interests and those who direct and control them. But this is a subject too great to be considered here and upon this bill. There is no probability of the adoption of any measure which shall disturb the existing system of currency and its connection with banks without its being fully investigated and without its having come before the country for mature consideration.

The amendment of the Senator from Kansas does not propose to destroy the existing system of banks or the connection between the currency, the public debt, and the banks. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri does not propose to accomplish this object. It is regarded by all as utterly impracticable to convert the entire body of the national debt, or even any very large proportion of it, at the present time into a floating circulation of Treasury notes issued by the Government, and whatever may be the merits of that proposition and however free from financial objections which have been urged against it, it is not a practical question now; for although I myself would be willing to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Kansas or the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the extent of such amount as can be issued, I can not see that that would prevent the difficulty which now lies before the country.

It seems reasonable to conclude that if the public credit was issued in the form of Treasury notes, redeemable in gold and silver at proper relative values, it would be in the power of the Government of the United States to maintain them at par. Certainly all the means of accomplishing this result which the present circulation has would belong in quite as great a degree to the Treasury note of the United States. I can not see why the aggregate resources of this Government are not greater than those of any collection of individuals to maintain its Treasury notes at par and redeemable in gold and silver; but the difficulty would be in another direction.

If you pay them out for the existing bonds, this would only be a change in the form of the public credit, and the effect of this on the values of property and commodities would have to be the subject of the most careful consideration. Its primary effect would be to make the Government the depositary of the entire amount of the issue of Treasury notes in gold and silver coin; that is, they would be redeemable in gold and silver on demand of the holder. Those holding such notes would endeavor to convert them into some form of income-producing use; and the same causes which now concentrate money into particular channels and places of deposit known as banks for its greater security and under the influence of convenience would affect this money as it does now with other money.

But the subject is one in which speculative opinion is of but little value, and any opinion short of exact reasoning and demonstration amounts to nothing.

In former days the amount of the currency or money was regulated by the chance production of the precious metals; and this was supplemented by associations of credit of individuals and by bills of credit of merchants.

But now, as then, the precious metals are the universal standard and measure of value among the nations of the world in their transactions with each other and in their commercial relations. Now, as then, their amount depends altogether on their chance production, of which there is no fixed amount, but they are supplemented with a great many additional forms of credit which are used in place of money to effect exchanges and represent values.

While the Government has certainly greater power than any aggregation of individuals to give certainty and value to these forms of credit and make them convertible into the universal standard, yet the Government can do nothing without the people, its forms of credit can have no value without their confidence, and their confidence is dependent on the ability of Government to make these forms of credit, whether bonds or money, convertible into the universal standards and representatives of value which are usable in commerce and travel throughout the world.

The amount of credit notes which the Government could maintain, convertible on demand into the universal standard or representative of value, would seem to be the limit of its capacity in issuing credit notes.

I can not see any evil in the abundance of money so long as there is no danger of its ceasing to be money and becoming depreciated or of no value in the hands of those who have exchanged valuable commodities or labor for it relying on its representative value, while on the other hand there are many manifest evils which proceed from its scarcity or its possession by the few.

I can see no reason why, if the holders of United States bonds would take them, the Government should not give them Treasury notes for them, and at the same time expend its taxes in the shape of other money in the retirement of other bonds. If the present rate of taxation should be continued, such a measure would rapidly retire the bonded debt and at the same time not contract the currency, but it would be subject to the objection of continuing the high-premium value of the bonds and the purchase of them at such price as the holders might demand, except as to that portion of them which are payable at the pleasure of the Government.

If Treasury notes are issued to replace bonds bought and currency retired, they can only be issued either to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government or to buy or exchange for bonds. If the revenue from taxes continues, we shall only have that much more surplus in the Treasury, which we shall be compelled to expend in the purchase of bonds at high-premium rates, increased by the fact of the necessity of the Government to expend its increased surplus revenue in the purchase of the bonds. It is true that the $305,529,000 3 percents might be retired at the pleasure of the Government, but this would leave the bonds bearing the higher rate of interest outstanding, and that which would be gained by converting them into Treasury notes without interest would be lost by the high-premium rates which you would be compelled to pay in appropriating the increased surplus revenue of the Treasury to the purchase of the bonds not redeemable at the pleasure of the Government.

It is not my purpose to express an opinion that it is not practicable and that it may not be necessary to issue the Government credit in the form of Treasury notes in the future financial exigencies of the people.

But the question for our consideration is how far it will best meet the present necessity of preventing a ruinous contraction of the currency without compelling the Government to pay an enormous premium for the bonds.

I venture to say that neither the Senator from Missouri nor the Senator from Kansas would undertake by this bill now and with the imperfect knowledge we have on the subject to fix the amount of circulating medium of Treasury notes which this Government could maintain convertible into the universal standard of commercial value. I apprehend there is no such question now before the Senate on this bill, and that it is not practicable for us to make it. I can myself see no difficulty in the way of issuing an amount of currency or Treasury notes such as the Senator from Kansas suggests except the difficulty that continuing the present rate of taxation you have to increase the purchase of bonds at their present or a higher premium value and at the same time continue the public debt in a different form, buying it up at an enormous premium on the one hand and issuing on the other a debt without interest. Between these two evils certainly a wise financial system must pursue a moderate course, neither buying the bonds at an exorbitant rate of premium simply for the sake of putting the Treasury notes into circulation nor continuing the enormous taxation upon the country in order that the bonds may be bought at this enormous and arbitrary premium value.

I am, therefore, Mr. President, of the opinion that the present remedial measures before the Senate against contraction are entirely wrong. I think the letter of Mr. St. John, president of the Mercantile National Bank of New York, is correct in that respect; and it is my opinion, and although I may be compelled to vote for one or the other of these measures, I desire to say that I can not perceive that without abandoning the present system of purchasing bonds at their high-premium rate, which it is impossible to do while the present surplus of revenue remains, there is any remedy whatever unless there be a power vested in the Secretary of the Treasury in some form, and, when necessary, with discretion and judgment to issue the public credit of the United States in a different form. Unquestionably this contraction is a demonstrable fact that must result from the present condition of things, from the high-premium value of the bonds, from the excessive surplus in the Treasury, from the necessity of using that surplus for the purpose of retiring the debt, thus making the Government a constant and standing purchaser and advertising for the purchase of bonds at whatever premium rate may be demanded for them.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have a few words to say in regard to what was said by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. I did not say the national banking system originated with one man. I had no interest in the question, and while I oppose that feature of the banking system which gives it control of the currency and circulation of the country, I have no sort of animosity to the national banks as banks of deposit or mediums of exchange and ordinary banking. I referred in my remarks to Mr. Potter's statement, who claims the paternity of the principle on which national banking institutions are based. For myself, I have been opposed throughout to the feature about which we are contending to-day, that is, the power to issue money. I do not care who originated the national banking system. The purpose, I have always understood, was to induce the people of the United States to invest in the public securities, so as to maintain the war. Now, the war having ended, the system is left, to be imposed on the people of the United States for an indefinite period.

As to what the Senator says about Mr. Benton's opinion on the power of the Government to issue paper money, I know that of all the statesmen in this country Mr. Benton would have been the first to have denounced this claim on the part of these corporations to usurp the functions of sovereignty.

Now, a word to my Democratic friend from Florida. If I could be astonished at anything in public life or public debate, I should express some astonishment at the statement of the Senator from Florida, a gentleman trained in the law, and, above all, in constitutional law, when he expresses the most profound astonishment at the idea that any Democrat should admit the power of the National Government to issue Treasury notes.

Mr. President, if I know anything about the history of the Democratic party and of the country, it has never been a question with Democrats or among intelligent lawyers as to the powers of the Government to issue Treasury notes. It is not necessary to go to the legal-tender opinion in 12 Wallace, where the Supreme Court unanimously declared that the Government has the power to emit bills of credit or Treasury notes. The struggle in that case was over the legal-tender quality of those notes. I have always believed that the court made the decision as to the legal-tender question as a military necessity, and nothing else, but as to Treasury notes without the legal-tender quality intelligent lawyers have always agreed.

Now let us look at history on this point. The Senator from Florida will see what the Government has done in regard to Treasury notes.

Treasury notes have been issued under the acts of 25th February, 1813; 26th December, 1814; 12th October, 1837; 31st January, 1842; 31st August, 1842; 22d July, 1846; 28th July, 1847; 23d December, 1857; the 25th February, 1862, and the several subsequent acts. They are binding on the Government.

Outside of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in 12 Wallace, which, so far as lawyers are concerned, is a finality on this question, the State courts have decided that—

Congress has constitutional power to issue Treasury notes of the United States, and make them lawful money. (Shallenberger vs. Brinton, 52 Pennsylvania State Reports; Brown vs. Welch, 26 Indiana, 116.)

I did not suppose there was anybody who would stand here and put his reputation upon the statement that there was no power in the Congress of the United States to issue Treasury notes. The whole history of the Government has been in that direction. It is no original question, it is no new question. It has been finally adjusted and settled.

But, sir, the Senator from Florida says the power to issue Treasury notes does not exist in the Government; and yet if he voted for the bill for which he has made his argument here to-day, or any bill reported from the Finance Committee, he gives to the national banks a power that does not exist in the Government itself. How water can come from a spring that has no water is a problem that I do not propose to solve. How the Government can give power to corporations that does not exist in the absolute sovereignty of the country itself, I leave the Senator from Florida to solve.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. PLUMB. I ask leave to amend my amendment by inserting, after the word "surrendered," in line 2:

And the same is not taken up by other national banks within thirty days thereafter.

Simply covering the chance of some national bank surrendering its currency at the same time that some other national bank wants to take it out.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator may modify his amendment, the yeas and nays not having been ordered.

Mr. PLUMB. And at the close I move to add:

The true intent and meaning of this section being that the volume of paper money outstanding, exclusive of gold and silver certificates, shall remain as now existing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas has the right to modify his amendment.

Mr. PLATT. Let the amendment be read.

The SECRETARY. After the words "surrendered," in line 2, it is proposed to insert the words:

And the same is not taken up by other national banks within thirty days thereafter.

And at the end of the amendment to add:

The true intent and meaning of this section being that the volume of paper money outstanding, exclusive of gold and silver certificates, shall remain as now existing.

So as to read:

That whenever the circulation of any national bank, or any portion thereof, shall be surrendered, and the same is not taken up by other national banks within thirty days thereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon issue an equivalent amount of Treasury notes of the denominations now provided by law for national-bank notes. Said Treasury notes shall be deposited in the Treasury and paid out as other moneys kept for the discharge of the obligations of the Government. They shall be receivable for salaries and for all dues to the Government, including duties on imports; shall be a legal tender between national banks and for all debts due to any national bank; shall be redeemable in coin, as the legal-tender notes of the United States now are; and when received into the Treasury they shall be reissued, and when mutilated or worn they shall be replaced, in the same manner as now provided by law for said legal-tender notes. The coin held in the Treasury at the date of the passage of this act for the redemption of the legal-tender notes of the Government shall also be applicable to the redemption of the Treasury notes herein provided for; and such coin reserve may, from time to time, be increased by adding thereto other sums from payments made into the Treasury, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That the total amount of said coin reserve shall never be less than 25 per cent. nor more than 30 per cent. of the total amount of legal-tender and Treasury notes outstanding; the true intent and meaning of this section being that the volume of paper money outstanding, exclusive of gold and silver certificates, shall remain as now existing.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas what he means by the phraseology "when a national bank shall surrender its circulation?" National banks do not surrender their circulation as a matter of fact. Under existing law when a national bank goes out of existence or takes up its bonds it simply deposits greenback notes. Is it the meaning of the amendment that when greenbacks are deposited in the Treasury immediately other greenbacks or other Treasury notes shall be issued to the amount of the greenbacks deposited? Is that the idea of the Senator?

Mr. PLUMB. That is the idea. The word "surrendered" is used as contradistinguished from the word "redeemed." If the word "redeemed" had been used there the issue of Treasury notes would have to await the slow and uncertain process of the redemption of notes outstanding and would not have met the case, because the moment a bank surrenders its circulation the full amount of that circulation is withdrawn from the volume of currency outstanding, not the precise notes of the national bank, but the greenback notes which are placed in the Treasury in order to enable them to take up their bonds and which from time to time are so used by the Treasury in the redemption of the national-bank notes. The surrender of the currency of a national bank is a process which is understood at the Treasury and which I think is sufficiently described by the word which I have used.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. INGALLS in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] as modified by himself.

Mr. VEST called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask the Senator from Kansas what we are to understand as the force and effect of the last amendment? It is in the words expressed that the true intent and meaning of the paper-money act is neither to increase nor diminish the paper circulation.

Mr. PLUMB. The design of the amendment is to maintain the volume of paper currency exactly where it is at the time of the passage of the law, answering precisely the same purpose in legislation which was answered by the law which prescribed that legal-tender notes of the United States then outstanding should not be diminished.

Mr. MORRILL. Suppose, however, the amount should be decreased or diminished, what effect would the amendment have?

Mr. PLUMB. It could neither increase it nor diminish if the amendment was carried out.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not see that the amendment would carry out the bill or the bill carry out the amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. The amendment gives to the Secretary of the Treasury power to issue Treasury notes only in the event that the national-bank notes are surrendered and to the amount to which they are surrendered, and that too within a period of thirty days during which time if other national banks take up circulation equivalent in amount the Secretary has nothing to do, no power or function to perform.

Mr. BUTLER. This is an important question and I should like very much to see the amendment as modified by the Senator from Kansas in the RECORD; and unless there is a very urgent desire to have a vote this evening, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. It is now after 4 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.
